The J. C. Saul Collection of Nineteenth Century
English Literature

Purchased in part through a contribution to the Library Funds made by the Department of English in University College.

(87) 291·R I

R66158.21

DIARY, REMINISCENCES, AND CORRESPONDENCE

OF

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW, F.S.A.

SELECTED AND EDITED

BY

THOMAS SADLER, Ph.D.

First Edition

IN THREE VOLUMES.—VOL. I.

378550
10 . 4 . 40

London:
MACMILLAN AND CO.
1869.

[All Rights Reserved.]

PR
5233
R2A8
V.1

"A Man he seems of cheerful yesterdays
And confident to-morrows; with a face
Not worldly-minded, for it bears too much
Of Nature's impress,—gaiety and health,
Freedom and hope; but keen withal, and shrewd.
His gestures note,—and hark! his tones of voice
Are all vivacious as his mien and looks."

The Excursion, Book VII.

PREFACE.

THE materials placed in the hands of the Editor, from which to make selections for the following work, were: —1. Brief journals reaching as far as 1810, inclusive; 2. A regular and full home Diary, begun in 1811, and continued till within five days of Mr. Robinson's death, forming thirty-five closely-written volumes; 3. About thirty volumes of Journals of tours; 4. Reminiscences, reaching down to the year 1843, inclusive; 5. Miscellaneous papers; 6. A large number of letters. It was Mr. Robinson's intention to very materially reduce the number of letters, and to leave only those which were valuable. This sifting he regarded as a chief work of his later years, and he was fond of quoting respecting it the saying of Dr. Aikin when struck by paralysis:—"I must make the most of the salvage of life." But although he destroyed a vast number of letters, the work of selection and arrangement was very far from completed.

The part of his papers of which he himself contemplated the posthumous publication, was a selection from his Reminiscences, with some letters. Many friends repeatedly urged him to make the necessary preparation for such a publication. Among these were

Rogers and Wordsworth. On the recommendation of the latter, Mr. Robinson laid special stress, for he said, "Wordsworth must be aware that there are many interesting particulars respecting himself, which I should wish to preserve, if I preserved anything." And the recommendation was, therefore, interpreted as a sanction to including these particulars with those relating to Goethe, Wieland, and others. To his executors, Mr. Robinson used to say, "If you were to print all that you find," (referring to the Reminiscences) "I should think you would show great want of judgment; and I should think the same if you came to the conclusion that there is nothing worth printing." About six weeks before his death, he met Mr. Macmillan, the publisher of these volumes, who, as they were going down to lunch, gave him his arm, and on the stairs said, "Mr. Robinson, I wonder that you have never been induced to undertake some great literary work." Mr. Robinson stopped, and placing his hand on Mr. Macmillan's shoulder, answered, "It is because I am a wise man. I early found that I had not the literary ability to give me such a place among English authors as I should have desired; but I thought that I had an opportunity of gaining a knowledge of many of the most distinguished men of the age, and that I might do some good by keeping a record of my interviews with them." And writing to his brother in 1842, he said, "When you complain of my not being so copious as I ought on such occasions, you only remind me of what I am already sufficiently aware, and that I want in an eminent degree the Boswell faculty. With his excellent memory and tact, had I early in life set about following his example, I might, beyond all doubt, have supplied a few volumes superior in value to his 'Johnson,' though they would not have been so popular. Certainly the names recorded in his great work are not so important as Goethe, Schiller, Herder, Wieland, the Duchesses Amelia and Louisa of Weimar, and Tieck—as Madame de Staël, La Fayette, Abbé Grégoire, Benjamin Constant — as Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, Rogers, Hazlitt, Mrs. Barbauld, Clarkson, &c. &c. &c., for I could add a great number of minor stars. And yet what has come of all this? Nothing. What will come of it? Perhaps nothing."

From the year 1811 the Diary is entitled to the most prominent place. The Reminiscences were not begun till Mr. Robinson had nearly reached three score years and ten; and even if they had been written in the freshness of his memory, and in the fulness of his mental vigour, they would still hardly have had equal value with the daily record, which breathes the air of the scenes and incidents to which it relates.

In the execution of his task, the Editor has kept two objects especially in view; first, to preserve interesting particulars respecting distinguished men, both in England and on the Continent; and, secondly, to keep unbroken the thread of Mr. Robinson's own life. One reason why the materials were put into his hands rather than those of one possessing more literary experience was, that he had been himself a student at German Universities, and was interested in German literature; but the chief reason was that, from various circumstances, he was likely to give due prominence to Mr. Robinson's own modes of thinking and mental characteristics, his independent unconforming ways, without which those who knew him best would feel that they had not a faithful portrait of their friend. If this were not secured, the executors would consider that they were not carrying out his own aim, in leaving the selection of editor to them, without guidance or restraint. The Editor has, therefore, felt it to be his duty to take all the care he could that the unpopular, or commonly uninteresting, subjects of Mr. Robinson's thought and interest should not be suppressed, in order to make the book more in accordance with the public taste.

The Editor cannot venture to hope that, in the first edition of the work, there will not be many mistakes. Mr. Robinson often excited surprise by his wonderful memory in the narration of personal incidents; but in regard to dates and names, it was not altogether without grounds that he called himself an incorrigible blunderer.

Of the mass of MS. which remains after selection, it will be enough to say, that it, for the most part, refers simply to the ordinary matters of private life, but that there are some parts which, though they could not, with propriety, be published now, may in time have a public interest and value.* It may, perhaps, not be out of place to give very briefly some of the most marked impressions of Mr. Robinson, which have been left on the Editor's mind, after reading the whole.

* Mr. Robinson's papers will be carefully preserved with a view to any historical value they may acquire by the lapse of time. It may be stated, as a rough guess, that the selections, not taking into account the letters, do not amount to more than a twenty-fifth or thirtieth part of the whole.

In Holcroft's "Hugh Trevor" there is a passage in which Mr. Robinson was greatly interested, because he felt it to be singularly applicable to himself: "I was possessed of that hilarity which, when not regulated by a strong desire to obtain some particular purpose, shows itself in a thousand extravagant forms, and is then called animal spirits; but when once turned to an attainment of some great end, assumes the more worthy appellation of activity of mind." Of this passage Mr. Robinson says, "I have through life had animal spirits in a high degree. I might, under certain circumstances, have had more." When he was in his seventieth year, Mrs. Clarkson said of him, that he was "as much a boy as ever." Wordsworth called him "a healthy creature, who talked of coming again in seven years as others would of seven days." And the first line of the Dedication to H. C. R. of the "Memorials of the Italian Tour" is:—

"Companion! By whose buoyant spirit cheered."

This was, doubtless, in some measure owing to a healthful and vigorous constitution. Very rarely does so long a life pass with so little interruption from illness. Even so late as 1831, when he was in Italy, he made an excursion with three gentlemen, one of whom, before their return, volunteered this confession: "When I heard that you were to be of the party I, at first, refused to go; 'for,' I said, 'Mr. Robinson is an old man, and the rest of us shall have to accommodate ourselves to his infirmities;' but you have already knocked up two of us, and all but me also."

Mr. Robinson was a voracious devourer of books. He read before he got up, and after he went to bed.

On his journeys, whether on foot or on a stage-coach, he was in the habit of spending much of his time in reading. The most attractive scenery had to share his attention with a book. He said, "I could have no pleasure at the sea-side without society. That is the one great want of my life, or rather the second,—the first being books." In a Christmas visit to Rydal, for a month or five weeks, he would read from ten to twenty volumes of such works as those of Arnold, Whately, and Isaac Taylor. Nor was he one of those who think they have read a work when they have only skimmed through it, and made themselves acquainted with its general contents. Sometimes he gives, in the Diary, an account of what he read, and there is a large bundle of separate papers, containing abstracts of books, plots of stories, and critical remarks.

In his case, however, there was no danger of becoming so absorbed in literature as to lose his interest in men. He was eminently social. But he liked to have to do with persons who had some individuality. It was an affliction to him to be obliged to spend several hours with one of those colourless beings, who have no opinions, tastes, or principles of their own. Writing from Germany to his brother, he said, "I love characters extremely." The words, "He is a character," are frequently the prelude to an interesting personal description. Of one whom he knew, he says, "All his conversation is ostentatious egotism; and yet it is preferable to the dry talk about the weather, which some men torment me with. The revelations of character are always interesting." This interest in characters seems to have given him an intuitive power of finding out noticeable men. Wherever he was—in London, Germany, or Rome—a secret affinity was almost sure to bring him into contact with those who were most worth knowing, and to lead to a lasting acquaintance with them. When compelled, by Napoleon's soldiers, to fly from Hamburg, and to take refuge in Stockholm, he formed a friendship with the veteran Arndt, and there was no diminution in the warmth of their greeting after an interval of twenty-seven years.

Mr. Robinson's name is widely known as that of a capital talker. There is a saying that a man's strength is also his weakness, and in this case there are not wanting jokes about his taking all the conversation to himself. It is reported that one day at a breakfast party at Sam Rogers's, the host said to those assembled, "Oh, if there is any one here who wishes to say anything, he had better say it at once, for Crabb Robinson is coming." But there is no subject on which he more frequently reproaches himself, than with this habit of taking too large a share of the talk. When his strength was beginning to fail, his friend Edwin Field urged him in a letter to refrain from talking "more than two hours consecutively." He notes this in the Diary, and adds, "Is this satire? It does not offend me." Yet he was too candid not to acknowledge that conversation was the one thing in which, in his own estimation, he excelled. It was, he said, his power of expression which enabled him to make his way as a barrister, notwithstanding his deficiencies in legal attainment.* He not only had a copious vocabulary, but could also convey much meaning by his manner, and by a playful exaggeration in his words.

Of this last use of speech he says in a letter to his brother:—"What I wrote about the parson's alleging that he had never seen me at church, was not altogether a joke, but was a real feeling, exaggerated into a joke, which is very much my habit in company, and, I may say, is one of the secrets of conversational tact. There is not a better way of insinuating a wholesome but unpalatable truth, than clothing it in language wilfully beyond truth, so that it may be taken as a satire on those who gravely maintain the same doctrine, by all who perhaps would not tolerate a sober and dry statement of it. I have the vanity to think I know how to do this, but I may sometimes fail, of course. The intelligent always understand me, and the dull are puzzled." It is not too much to say, that to the great majority of those who were in the habit of meeting him his conversation was a real delight. The Editor well remembers the secret pleasure with which he invariably saw him come into the room, and the feeling which the announcement of his death caused, as of a loss which, in kind, could never be made up. There were veins in his conversation, from which more good was to be gained in a pleasant hour after dinner, than from many a lengthened serious discourse.

Throughout life Mr. Robinson was a man of unusual activity. He himself would hardly have admitted this. A title that suggested itself to him for his Reminiscences was, "Retrospect of an Idle Life." When on one occasion he was told by his medical attendant that he had been using his brain too much, he exclaimed, "That is absurd." He would say of himself, that while he talked too much he did nothing. But in truth men "who have nothing to do," are very serviceable members of society, if they only know how to employ their time.

* Whatever amount of truth there may be in Mr. Robinson's own idea of his legal attainments, he, at all events, as the Diary shows, was a great reader of legal books, while he was in practice at the Bar.

Those who knew him best, protested against the self-reproaches he heaped upon himself for not being of more use. Miss Denman says in a letter:—"I must scold you in good earnest. What can you mean by complaining of being useless in the world, when you must be conscious that every human being you ever called friend, has found you one in any and every emergency where your kindness and services could be made available? Do we not all feel and acknowledge this, and are you the only forgetful person? I'll tell you what you should do. When the uncomfortable discouraging idea is taking hold of your mind, call over the names of the persons you have been most intimate with, and ask yourself before you dismiss each name,—Have I never done a service, given useful advice or pecuniary aid, to this person? Try this, and I think your mind will be relieved from the fancied evil." He was, as he himself expressed it, "A busy idle man."

In the early part of his life, simple habits and a very limited expenditure were necessary to "make both ends meet." But when his means became considerable he had no desire to alter, materially, his mode of living. He did not covet the kind of rank and station which are attained by a costly establishment and a luxurious table. He had not a single expensive habit; but he said, "My parsimony does not extend to others." He would rather help some widow to bring up her children, or some promising young man to obtain superior educational advantages. But he had his own method of giving. It was rather in the spirit of generosity, than of charity, in the narrower sense of that word. He had his pensioners among the poor, but he had a wholesome fear of encouraging a spirit of dependence, and was conscientiously on his guard against that kind of liberality which is easily taken in. There were friends to whom he used to say, "If you know of any case in which money will do good, come to me!"* And he did not like to be much thanked; he felt humiliated by it, when he had simply followed the natural dictates of kindness and goodwill. He was especially fond of promoting the enjoyment of the young. "In the happiness of the young," he said, in a letter to his brother, "we, the aged, if we are not grossly selfish, shall be able to take pleasure." If it were rumoured that the students of University Hall wanted the relief of a dance, towards the close of a session of hard study, they would presently hear that an anonymous friend had presented £50 for the purpose. He took great pains with his gifts. He would often get some friend to choose a wedding present, and the value was

* Mr. Robinson often said to E. W. Field, "You cannot think what a trouble it is to me to spend a shilling on myself; but if you know of any good way of using my money, come to me."

"not to be less than a sum named"—always a handsome amount. With a book-gift, he would sometimes send a long and valuable letter about the best way to read it. In Rome, on the birthday of Pepina, Miss Mackenzie's adopted child, he put into her hands a present of money, with a kind letter of advice, which he hoped would be valuable to her in after life. There was often peculiar delicacy in his acts of generosity. In one of his tours, he found his old friend Charlotte Serviere somewhat narrowed in her circumstances, and, calling at Frankfort on his way back, he begged her to do him the favour of relieving him of a part of the too large balance which his tour had left in his hands, and to excuse a pecuniary gift from an old friend. He would not let her express the gratitude she felt; but on leaving the house, on a subsequent visit, he could not prevent the old servant from seizing him by the hand, and saying, "I thank you for the great joy you have given to the Fräulein." Some who are now thriving in fortune, and holding a prominent place in the literary world, will remember the little "sealed notes," containing a valuable enclosure, for which he would fain have it believed that a volume or two of the author's works, or a ticket to a course of lectures, was ample return. Nor was his generosity by any means confined to pecuniary gifts, and personal exertions.

Not a few of his best anecdotes have got, prematurely, into print. This was inevitable with a good talker. And he would not have avoided it, if he could, by putting a restraint on the sociability of his nature, though he did like to have his anecdotes told as they ought to be. Not only, however, did some of his best anecdotes get abroad, if sometimes in an imperfect form, but he seems to have had no disposition to keep back other matter, though strictly under his own control. When he heard that Moore was preparing a "Life of Byron," he wrote a letter, which, it appears, never reached its destination, giving a full account of those highly interesting interviews, in which Goethe's opinions of Byron were expressed. Mrs. Austin, in her "Characteristics of Goethe," and Mr. Gilchrist, in his "Memoirs of Blake," not to mention others, received valuable contributions from Mr. Robinson; and this, notwithstanding that recollections of his own would, in all probability, be some day published.

His love for the young showed itself, not only in his thoughtfulness for their pleasure, but also in the allowance he made for their faults.* Jean Paul says, that in the young man the wing feathers (the impulsive energies) are chiefly developed, and that the tail feathers (the balancing power, or judgment) are the growth of later years. Accordingly, Mr. Robinson, though himself of the widest toleration, thought "intolerance not inexcusable in a young man. Tolerance comes with age." His own large experience of diversity of opinion, taste, and feeling, combined with excellence of character, had made him thoroughly catholic in spirit; and, with his tendency to self-depreciation, he was (to borrow Dr. King's expression) "too modest to be tolerant." But there were two classes of persons who formed exceptions. One consisted of those who spoke disrespectfully of his demigods; the other class is indicated by his own words: "I cannot tolerate the toleration of slavery." Of these two forms of intolerance, the first, which cost him some friendships, he acknowledged as a fault, and, on various occasions, expressed his deep regret at it, as arising from a want of control over his temper; the second he felt to be a virtue. To one who was satirical on the subject of slavery, he said, "Lord John is fair game, and the Times, and the Whigs, too, if by Whigs you mean the great Whig families; but humanity is too sacred a subject for irony."

* Not indeed for the faults of the young only. "Dr. E. spoke with spirit about T. I defended poor T. as well as I could, with more love than logic. He is indefensible. Amyot cheered me on, who loves all his old friends; he gives up none."—H. C. R., October 22, 1832.

Mr. Robinson used to lament that he had not the faculty of giving a graphic account of the illustrious men with whom he came into contact. He had, at all events, one qualification for interesting others—he was interested himself. The masters of style have no arts which can take the place of a writer's own enthusiasm in his subject. Mr. Robinson's descriptions are often all the more effective from their very naturalness and simplicity. The Italian tour, with Wordsworth, may be cited as an example. What was written on the journeys is, on the whole, hardly equal to the ordinary home Diary. Nor is that tour one of the best, so far as the record is concerned. And yet the few notes, jotted down day by day, are admirably illustrative of Wordsworth's mind and character, and are strikingly confirmed by the "Memorials" written by him afterwards. The poet's love for natural beauties rather than works of art, for the country rather than the towns, for fresh life in bird, or flower, or little child, rather than for the relics of the things of old—his annoyance at the long streets of Bologna—his eagerness to depart from the fashionable watering-place of Ischl—the wide difference in his interest in those places which have influenced the character and works of a great man, and those which have only been outwardly associated with him—his being allured by the sound of a stream, and led on and on till midday, notwithstanding that he was expected back to breakfast, and the relief his anxious friend felt as soon as he heard the same sound, knowing that it would be likely to be irresistible to the truant, and tracking him out by this clue:—these and kindred touches of character have in them the material and colouring of genuine biography.

The time spent by Mr. Robinson in Germany, as a young man, was a turning-point in his life. And he did not derive the advantage of between four and five years' study there, in the best society, without leaving a very favourable impression on many, whose esteem and friendship were, in the highest degree, honourable to him, as well as a rich possession. He must have been a tolerable German scholar to have been able to personate Professor Fichte to the lionizing landlord and the confidential priest. What warm greetings he invariably received at Jena and Weimar, Frankfort and Heidelberg! So thoroughly had he entered into the thoughts and customs of his German friends, that they felt themselves to be understood by him, and fully trusted him to represent them on his return to his native country. And certainly, if he were a "missionary of English poetry in Germany," he was also a missionary of German literature in England. This is amply acknowledged in the "Memoirs of Frederick Perthes."* Besser, the partner of Perthes, writing from England in 1814, says: "Such men as Robinson are of rare occurrence in England. A better medium than this remarkable and most attractive man it would be impossible for Germany to find. I unconsciously place him, in my mind, by the side of Villers, and then the different influence which a thorough German education has had on the Frenchman and on the Englishman is very striking."

Mr. Robinson's breakfast and dinner-parties were characteristically interesting. He did not seek to gather about him either the lions or the wits of the day. There were witty men and eminent men at his table, but not as such were they invited. None were allowed to come there who showed themselves to be either intolerant or subservient. He liked to gather around him cultivated and earnest representatives of various phases of political and religious thought. "His house" (Mr. Tayler said in his address at Highgate) "was a centre of attraction for minds from the most opposite points in the wide horizon of opinion. Softened by his genial spirit, and animated by his cheerful flow of kindly and interesting talk, Tories and Liberals, High-Churchmen and Dissenters, found themselves side by side at his hospitable board, without suspecting that they were enemies, and learned there, if they had never learned it before, how much deeper and stronger is the common human heart, which binds us all in one, than those intellectual differences which are the witness of our weakness and infallibility, and sometimes the expression of our obstinacy and self-will." It was, indeed, no small privilege to hear the passing topics of the day, and the chief questions of literature, talked over by able men of such widely differing points of view, and in a spirit of mutual respect and kindness. And the host, who was as free in the expression of his own opinions as he was ready to listen to the opinions of others, seldom failed to bring to bear on the question under consideration some recollection from Weimar or Highgate, a walk with Wordsworth at Rydal, or an evening with Charles Lamb.

* Vol. I., ch. xix., p. 253.

To those who were not intimate with Mr. Robinson, what he says respecting religion may sometimes be puzzling. There are occasions when his words seem to imply that with him belief was rather hoped for than an actual possession. He thought there was more real piety in the exclamation of the anxious father in the Gospels, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief," than in the confident and self-satisfied assertion of the longest creed. His sympathy in opinions was with those who have exercised the fullest liberty of thought. He had traversed far and wide the realms of theological speculation, and in every part he had found sincere and devout men. But he was always interested and touched by genuine religious feeling, wherever he found it—whether in the simple and fervent faith of the Moravians at Ebersdorf, or in the blessings which the old Catholic woman at Bischoffsheim * poured upon Christian Brentano, or in the vesper service at the wayside inn in the Tyrol, or in the family worship at Ambleside, where "sweet Jessie" Harden "read the prayers." He thoroughly entered into the sentiment of the author of the "Religio Medici,"—"I cannot laugh at, but rather pity, the fruitless journeys of pilgrims, or condemn the miserable condition of friars; for though misplaced in circumstances, there is something in it of devotion. I could never hear the Ave Mary bell without an elevation, or think it a sufficient warrant, because they erred in one circumstance, for me to err in all—that is, in silence and contempt. Whilst, therefore, they directed their devotions to her, I offered mine to God, and rectified the errors of their prayers by rightly ordering mine own." Looking to the church of the future, he hoped there would be found in it "the greatest quantity of religion founded on devotional sentiment, and the least quantity of church government compatible with it, and consistent with order." The concluding paragraph of his obituary of his friend Anthony Robinson, written in 1827, is strikingly applicable to himself:—"Could Mr. Robinson be justly deemed a religious man? If religion be a system of confident conclusions on all the great points of metaphysical speculation, as they respect the universe and its author — man and his position in the one, and relation to the other — it must be owned Mr. Robinson laid no claim to the character. But if the religious principle be that which lays the foundations of all truth deeper than the external and visible world; if religious feeling lie in humble submission to the unknown Infinite Being, who produced all things, and in a deep sense of the duty of striving to act and live in conformity with the will of that Being; if, further, Christianity consist in acknowledging the Christian Scriptures as the exposition of the Divine will, and the guide of human conduct—then, surely, he may boldly claim to be a member of that true Christian Catholic church, according to his own definition of it—'An association of men for the cultivation of knowledge, the practice of piety, and the promotion of virtue.'" *

* Where Christian Brentano had been at school.

Mr. Robinson was an earnest thinker on the profoundest and most difficult religious subjects. This was especially the case in his old age. As we like to look up to the stars, though we may not be able to tell their magnitude or their distance, and to behold the majesty of the sea, though we may not be able to fathom its depths, so he seemed to be attracted to the great problems of religion, as if he liked to feel their infinitude, rather than hoped to find their solution. He stated as his experience, that "Religion in age supplies the animal spirits of youth." His old age had its pathetic side, as, indeed, every old age must have.

Those who, in his later years, met him in society, and saw how full of life he was, with what zest and animation he told his old stories, merely requiring, now and then, help as to a name or a date, may easily have imagined his strength greater than it really was.

* Monthly Repository, 1827, p. 293.

But, though few, perhaps, have ever so closely watched the approach of infirmity, and though he was in the habit of saying, "Growing old is like growing poor, a sort of going down in the world," his frequent expression was, "This does not make me melancholy." And when, at last, "Everything seemed to tire," there was, with this feeling of mortal weariness, another feeling, which was that he was—

"On the brink of being born."

T. S.

Hampstead.

The Editor desires to acknowledge the valuable assistance he has received; and would especially mention James Gairdner, Esq., of the Record Office; George Scharf, Esq., one of Mr. Robinson's intimate and highly valued friends; and J. Morley, Esq., author of "Burke: a Historical Study," &c. Mr. Gairdner made the selections in some of the years. The proofs have had the advantage of additional notes, especially in connection with art, by Mr. Scharf, and of excellent suggestions by Mr. Morley. Dr. Wagner has rendered a like service, in regard to those parts which relate to Germany. The admirable paper by Mr. De Morgan, at the end of the third volume, speaks for itself. In acknowledging the kindness of Lady Byron's relatives, in regard to the letters by her, the Editor cannot but add the expression of a hope, that, before long, the public may have the opportunity of a fuller acquaintance with the correspondence of one capable of writing such letters.

CONTENTS OF VOL. I.

PAGE

CHAPTER I. 1789.

Family and Childhood 1

CHAPTER II. 1790–5.

Articled Clerk at Colchester 16

CHAPTER III. 1795.

Interval at Bury 28

CHAPTER IV. 1796–9.

Unsettled Life in London—Correspondence with Robert Hall. . . . 34

CHAPTERS V., VI., VII., VIII., IX. 1800-5.

In Germany 69

CHAPTER X. 1805–6.

In London—Acquaintance with Mrs. Barbauld, and C. and M. Lamb . 225

CHAPTER XI. 1807.

In Holstein, as "Times Correspondent". 231

CHAPTER XII. 1807-9.

In London, as Foreign Editor of the Times—Acquaintance with Wordsworth—At Corunna, as "Times Correspondent" 263

CHAPTER XIII. 1810.

In London—Acquaintance with Coleridge and Flaxman 298

CHAPTER XIV. 1811.

In London—Debating Societies—Coleridge's Lectures—Southey—Resolution to Study for the Bar. 318

CHAPTER XV. 1812.

In London—Studies for the Bar—Lectures by Coleridge and Hazlitt . 366

PAGE

CHAPTER XVI. 1813.

Acquaintance with Talfourd—Madame de Staël in London—Circuit—Takes Chambers 406

CHAPTER XVII. 1814.

European Politics—Practice at the Bar—Tour in France—La Fayette—French Courts of Justice—Madame de Staël—Benjamin Constant—Schlegel—"The Excursion" 425

CHAPTER XVIII. 1815.

"The Excursion"—Buonaparte's Escape from Elba—Death of H. C. R.'s Father—Tour in Belgium and Holland—Visit to Waterloo—Progress at the Bar 468

ERRATA.

Vol. I. p. 34, line 21, for "Malden" read Maldon
p. 106, line 19, for "from 92*s.* to 13*s.*" read from 92*s.* to 30*s.*
p. 375, note, omit "not contained in his published works." C. Lamb's "Triumph of the Whale" is in his "Works," though not among his collected poems.

Vol. II. In Table of Contents, "Croker," instead of being at the beginning of CHAP. XVI., should be at the end of CHAP. XV.
p. 3, line 19, for "Bannister" read Banister.
p. 7, line 21, for "Buck's" read Bucks.
p. 64, line 8, for "Hutchinson" read Hutchison.
p. 71, line 13, for "Carlisle" read Carlile.
p. 114, line 20, for "presents" read presented.
p. 116, line 28, for "Jekyl" read Jekyll.
p. 117, line 3, ditto ditto.
p. 208, line 6, for "Being" read He being.
p. 286, line 9, for "Alsop" read Allsop.
p. 290, note, for "General Gifford" read Captain, now Major Gifford.
p. 418, line 27, for "en bon point" read embonpoint.

Vol. III. p. 277, line 3, for "Melancthon" read Melanchthon.

REMINISCENCES

OF

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON.

CHAPTER I.

FAMILY AND CHILDHOOD.

IT is one of the evidences, or shall I say consequences, of a happy frame of mind, that I am capable of deriving pleasure from things, the absence or even loss of which does not give me pain. I should have rejoiced had I been well born, could I have reckoned historical characters among my ancestors; but it has never occasioned me any serious uneasiness that my family are of as insignificant a class as can be imagined. Among the Robinsons I cannot find a single individual who appears to have acquired any distinction, and among the Crabbs only a remote probability of an affinity to a single individual of the name, who has ever been heard of—and that is the Poet.

Ancestors.

My father used to say that his great-grandfather was a tanner at Bildeston in Suffolk, and that his name was Henry. My great-grandfather was Thomas. He was a tanner at Sudbury, where he is said to have attained the dignity of Mayor.

41

Chap. I.

Marriage of H. Robinson and Jemima Crabb.

Some circumstances concerning the marriage of my father and mother are worth writing down. I have forgotten from whom I heard them. My mother Jemima Crabb was the eldest daughter of a large family, and when of an age to be useful she left her father's crowded house to reside at Bury with a family very intimate with her own. Mr. Bullen, the head of this family, being a Dissenter, it was quite a matter of course that Miss Crabb should be known to the Robinsons. My grandfather was reputed wealthy, and was certainly one of the most respectable of the Dissenters. Jemima Crabb could have very little fortune, and my grandfather did not consent to a love-match between her and his second son Henry. She therefore returned to Wattisfield. One day her brother Zachariah seeing Henry Robinson in the Market-place, said to him, "Not yet married, Master Henry? I expected to hear of your marriage before this time." Henry answered, "No, Mr. Zachary, as I cannot have your sister Mimie I won't marry at all." A few days after this, a letter came to him from Miss Crabb, in which she said she was sorry for what she had heard from her brother—that it would be sinful in him not to marry, for it is God's ordinance, and he should not refuse to do so because he could not have the first woman he had taken a liking to. It would be undutiful to his father also, who did not approve of his marrying her. She hoped to hear that he had thought better of this, and that he would make a happy marriage in conformity with his father's wishes.

This letter Henry showed to his brother Thomas, who carried it to his father. The old gentleman was so pleased with its tone that he withdrew his objection. Henry immediately went over to Wattisfield with the good news, and the marriage soon followed. It took place in 1766.

Birth of Henry Crabb Robinson, 1775.

There were born two children, who died in infancy; and besides these Thomas, born January 25th, 1770, Habakkuk, born June 4th, 1771, and Henry Crabb, the writer of these Reminiscences, born May 13th, 1775.

When I was about twenty-one years of age I met on a stage-coach a very gentlemanly man, who, hearing my name, asked me whether my father was not a tanner, and whether my mother's name was not Crabb. Surprised at the question from a stranger I inquired why he asked. He thus explained himself—"More than twenty years ago I attended the Gentlemen's Club at The Angel, when the chairman gave as a toast, 'The Handsome Couple;' I was from the country, and it was then related to me that that morning there had been married a couple said to be the handsomest pair ever known to have lived at Bury. I recollect that the names were Robinson and Crabb, and that he was a young tanner."

Earliest Recollections of H. C. R.

In general, it is not easy to fix a date to the earliest recollections. My mother's pocket-books supply a few. The very earliest that I am aware of is the being taken out one night in the arms of the nurse to see an illumination. I recollect being frightened at the report of a gun, or some fireworks, and that advantage was taken of my crying to carry me home. Now my mother writes under February 15th, 1779, "The town (Bury

Chap. i. — 1780.

St. Edmunds) illuminated in honour of Admiral Keppel." I was then three years and nine months old, being born May 13th, 1775.

Mrs. Bard's School.

I recollect going to a dame's school, to a Mrs. Bard who lived in a very small house in the South Gate Street. I find a payment of five shillings to Mrs. Bard —one quarter, for H. C. R. This was in July, 1780.

Early Recollections.

I have a very clear recollection of seeing my aunt Williamson enter the keeping-room one morning and lift up her hands in a melancholy way, on which my mother exclaimed "My father's dead!" In her pocket-book she has written, Feb. 25th, 1781, "My dear father died. 26th, Sister here by breakfast." This same aunt Williamson had a doleful tone of voice which I used to make game of; I recollect being reproved for crying out on her coming one day from Wattisfield "Behold, the groaner cometh."

I find that these are not the very earliest recollections, for it appears that my grandmother Crabb died June 22nd, 1779; now I very well recollect hearing it discussed with my mother whether the departed would be known in the other world, and saying "I shall know my grandmamma in heaven by the green ribbon round her cap."

Another very early, but also faint recollection is of going with my mother to see the camp on Fornham Heath, of being lost there, and taken into a tent by some officers and feasted, and while there seeing my mother pass, and calling out to her with great joy. This must have been in the summer of 1778.

Of early education and religious instruction I recollect next to nothing. I was an unruly boy, and my mother had not strength to keep me in order. My father never attempted it. I have a faint impression of having learnt a catechism, in which there was this: "Dear child, can you tell me what you are?" A. "I am a child of wrath like unto others." I have never found this precisely in any catechism—but I was brought up with Calvinistic feelings.

Mr. Blomfield's School.

It appears from my mother's pocket-book that I went to school in the year 1781 to old Mr. Blomfield. He was the grandfather of the present Bishop of London. My brothers went with me for a short time. They went to a boarding-school in 1782, and then, I incline to think, I was removed to an inferior English and Writing School kept by a Mr. Lease.

One really interesting occurrence I recollect which I have often thought of as significant. There used to be given to the boy who was at the head of his class a box and ring, and he had a present if he could keep it a certain number of days. On one occasion I lost it, to my great sorrow, and as I thought, very unjustly; therefore next day I went boldly to young Blomfield, who was an usher under his father, and with a book in my hand, and with a consciousness of injured innocence, said, "Sir, you turned me down for spelling the word —— so, but I was right after all. There, see! I was right." Mr. Blomfield smiled, patted me on the head, and said, "Well, Henry, as you read it in a printed book you are not to blame, but that's printed wrong." I was quite confounded, I believed as firmly in the infallibility of print as any good Catholic can in the infallibility of his church. I knew that naughty boys would tell stories, but how a book could contain a falsehood was quite incomprehensible.

Chap. i. — 1781.

Mother's Influence.

I will here mention what is the most important of all my reminiscences, viz.: that in my childhood my mother was to me everything, and I have no hesitation in ascribing to her every good moral or religious feeling I had in my childhood or youth. Had she possessed more knowledge and more activity she might have made a much better character of me. But she was guided by the instinct of motherly love and pious feelings. It was, I dare say, with a purpose, that when I had one day brought home a pin from Mrs. Ling's (an old lady with whom she used to drink tea) she made me carry it back with an apology, my excuse being that I did not think it was of any value; she thus gave me a respect for property. This same Mrs. Ling had an engraving in her parlour. She told me it was Elisha raising the Shunammite's son. And what story was that, I asked her. "I thought, Master R., you had been better educated," she replied very formally. I was much affronted, but set about reading the Bible immediately.

My mother's mantua-maker was a Roman Catholic. I was one day told to go to her, but was unwilling to do so; I said I was afraid of her, I was told she was a Pope and would do me a harm. My mother scolded me as a silly boy and forced me to go. I believe she gave Mrs. Girt a hint, for the latter bribed me to religious tolerance by giving me shreds of silk and satin to clothe pictures with, which was a favourite employment. This reminds me that I had very early a great horror of Popery, my first notions of which were taken from a ballad relating how

"As Mordecai the Jew one day Was skating o'er the icy way," he fell in, and would have been drowned, but a Popish priest came by. The Jew called for help. "You, a Jew! I won't help a Jew." "If you will help me out I will be baptized." "You must be baptized first." The Jew consented, and then begged to be taken out. "No," said the priest, "if I let you out you will relapse into Judaism and so be damned. I will rather save your soul."

"And saying this he in a trice Clapped Mordecai beneath the ice."

Could and would men closely examine they would probably find that their most inveterate religious prejudices, which they think their most valuable religious convictions, are of such origin. But Mrs. Girt's bits of silk went far to counteract the ballad.

When a child, like other children, my faith was implicit in what I was told to be true by my mother, and I have no sense of devotion now, which I did not catch from her.

Things connected with Religion.

The name of the minister whose religious services my father and mother attended was Lincolne. He was a gentlemanly person and inspired respect, especially by a very large white wig. He was often at our house, and his two daughters were my mother's very great friends. When he came I used to be kept at a distance, for I was always running about as well as talking and he was afraid for his gouty toes. When I set about reading the Bible I used to ask my mother questions. Her prudent answer frequently was, "Ask the minister, my dear." I recollect hearing some anecdotes told of me and the minister, and some I seem to recollect myself, one especially. I had taken a great fancy to the Book of Revelation; and I have heard, but this I don't recollect, that I asked Mr. L. to preach from that book, because it was my favourite. "And why is it your favourite book, Henry?" "Because it is so pretty and easy to understand."

I had a happy childhood. The only suffering I recollect was the restraint imposed upon me on Sundays, especially being forced to go twice to Meeting; an injurious practice I am satisfied. To be forced to sit still for two hours, not understanding a word, was a grievance too hard to be borne. I was not allowed to look into a picture-book, but was condemned to sit with my hands before me, or stand, according to the service. The consequence was that I was often sent to bed without my supper for bad behaviour at Meeting. In the evening my father used to read aloud Mr. Henry's Commentary, and in winter it was my agreeable occupation to turn the apple pie that was in a Dutch-oven before the fire, which was a great relief from Mr. Henry. Once I recollect being whipped by my mother for being naughty at Meeting. A sad preparation for a religious life.

Now and then by way of treat or reward for good behaviour I was allowed to go to the Independent Meeting to hear Mr. Waldegrave preach. Mr. W. as I afterwards knew, was an ignorant, noisy, ranting preacher; he bawled loud, thumped the cushion, and sometimes cried. He was, however, a kind man, and of course he was a favourite of mine. It belongs perhaps to a later time, but I well recollect he repeatedly used the phrase, "But as the 'Postle Paul say" (say is Suffolk grammar). And after all I could carry away a thought now and then from him.

Mother.

To return to my mother's instructions; I recollect a practice of hers, which had the best effect on my mind. She never would permit me (like all children, a glutton) to empty the dish at table if there was anything particularly nice, such as pudding or pie. "Henry, don't take any more; do you not suppose the maids like to have some?" A respect and attention to servants and inferiors was a constant lesson, and if I have any kindness and humanity in my ordinary feelings I ascribe it all to her, and very much to this particular lesson.

Mr. Lease's School.

Of my schooling at Mr. Lease's I have little or nothing to say. I was an ordinary boy and do not recollect acquiring any distinction at school. The sons of Mr. Lease I knew and the children of some other Dissenters who went there; but some others of my acquaintance went to the Grammar School. This set them above the rest of us, and I believe I should have wanted to go to the Grammar School too, but I had heard that Mr. Lawrence was a flogging master, and I was therefore glad to escape going there.

It was either in 1782 or 1783, the Annual Register of the year will say which, that there was a very hard winter throughout the country. To raise a fund for the poor of the town, the Grammar School boys were induced to act plays at the theatre. I have a distinct recollection of some of the boy actors; the principal play was Venice Preserved. There is nothing worth noticing in the acting of the tragedy, but it is a significant circumstance, and one that belongs to the state of moral and religious feeling in the country between sixty and seventy years ago,* that the farce acted with Venice Preserved was Foote's Minor, the performers being school-boys! It would seem impossible, but it becomes less surprising when one recollects that the hatred of the clergy was still active against the Methodists, that Dr. Squintum (Whitfield) was vigorously satirized, and that the religious classes were the object of derision to all the genteel part of the community, especially to the clergy. I only wonder that I was allowed to be present, but probably the Dissenters, certainly my parents, knew nothing about such plays.

CHAP. I. — 1782.

School Plays.

How much I understood of the farce I cannot now tell. Perhaps little clearly. But children are content with confused and obscure perceptions of a pleasurable character.

When very young indeed my mother delighted me by singing a ballad which must be in some of the popular collections. It was about the rich young lady who lived "in the famous town of Reading," and fell in love with a poor lawyer. She challenges

* This was written in 1845.

him and he is forced to fight or marry her in a mask. He consults a friend who answers

> "If she's rich you are to blame,
> If she's poor you are the same."

Chap. I. — 1786.

Of course it ends happily. I used to delight in this story. Children's moral feelings are not more delicate than those of the people or their poets.

I recollect too the coming out of John Gilpin, and rather think I had a sixpence given me for learning it by heart.

Mr. Fenner's School at Devizes.

My mother's sister married a Dissenting minister, Mr. Fenner, who kept a boarding-school at Devizes. I was accordingly sent to his school, where I remained three years. The time passed pleasantly enough, but I have often regretted that my educational advantages were not greater at this period of my life. Among the places in the neighbourhood where I spent some happy days was a gentleman's seat called Blacklands. At that time it was occupied by an old gentleman named Maundrel, one of whose sons was at the same school with me. The old gentleman was burly and bluff, very kind and generous, but passionate; once or twice he did not scruple to box the ears of his young visitors. Not far from the house was a horse cut out of the chalk hill. I believe it exists still. Maundrel set us boys—there were some seven or eight of us—to weed it, and very good workmen we were. He used also to make us carry logs of wood for the fires upstairs, telling us that we must work for our living. But he fed us well.

Chap. I.
—
1788.

During my school life I obtained among my school fellows the reputation of being a good talker, anc was put forward as a speaker on public matters i school, such as a combination against a head-boy And I was also noted as an inventor of tales, whicl I used to relate to the boys in bed; but this faculty did not grow with me, and has utterly died away. had no distinction in any branch of school-exercis but one, and this was French. I did not like learning it at first, and wrote to my mother to beg that might be relieved from the task; but she wisely tool no notice of my letter. Before I left school I likec French above everything, and was quite able to reac with pleasure the French classics, as they are called.

I did not once go home during the three years o my school life at Devizes, but in the summer of th second year my mother came to see me. The sensation which I most distinctly recollect is that of seein her at the Turnpike-gate of the Green. I thought he altered, or rather for a moment did not know hei and that pained me; but she gradually became to m what she had been.

Though Mr. Fenner was a minister I received n religious instruction at his school. What I fancied t be religion was of my own procuring. I had faller in with De Foe's Family Instructor, and I became a once in imagination a religious teacher. I had a opportunity of trying my power, for during one of my last holidays I was left with a few Irish boys when Mr. and Mrs. Fenner went a journey. I was th older and placed in authority over the other boys and I was not a little pleased with myself for my mode of governing them. On the Sunday I read a sermon to them, and I made the boys and servants attend prayers. But I scorned reading a prayer; I prayed extempore, and did not hold my gift in low estimation.

Mr. Crabb's School at Wattisfield.

In the summer of 1789 I returned home with Mr. Fenner and my aunt. My uncle Crabb had a few years before accepted the office of pastor at the Wattisfield Meeting, and as he intended to open a school there, I went to him for the next half-year. Our numbers were so few that we were subject to little of the ordinary restraint of school.

It was while here that I had a letter from my brother Thomas directed to "Mr. Robinson, Attorney at Law." I had to ask Mr. Crabb to explain to me the nature of an attorney's profession, which had been chosen for me without my knowledge.

So entirely have I lost all recollection of the few months spent at Wattisfield that I cannot call to mind anything I studied or read. I only recollect having a sentiment of respect and regard towards Mr. Crabb.

The French Revolution.

I recollect too that it was while I was with Mr. Crabb that the French Revolution broke out, that every one rejoiced in it as an event of great promise, and that Popery and absolute government were both to be destroyed. Though I had no proper political knowledge, yet I had strong party feelings. In my childhood I had always heard the Church spoken of as an unjust institution, and thought Dissenters a persecuted body.

CHAP. I.
—
1789.

I can testify to this fact, that very strong prejudic may be raised without any degree or sort of knowledg in justification of the sentiment. I knew too I wa or rather that my friends were Presbyterians, and had a vague notion that the Independents were mor orthodox than was reasonable, and that there was degree of rationality compatible with sound doctrin Mr. Lincolne, too, our minister, was much more of gentleman and scholar than Mr. Waldegrave, the Ir dependent Minister.

Mother.

Among my letters are a number by my dear mothe Her memory is very dear to me, but I would nc have these letters survive me. They would not agree ably impress a stranger, but they express the warr affections of a fond mother, full of anxiety for th welfare of her children. Her mother-love was com bined with earnest piety. She had no doctrinal zea and seems, though educated in a rigidly orthodo: family, to have had very little knowledge of religiou controversy.

It is worth mentioning that I have found my mother' Experience, that is the paper she delivered in befor she was admitted a member of the church at Wattis field. The paper is in one respect curious; it show that at that time even among the Independents, doc trinal faith was not the subject of a formal professior though of course inferred. In this paper there is n allusion to the Trinity, or any other disputed doctrine Indeed, the word belief scarcely occurs. The on sentiment which runs throughout is a consciousnes of personal unworthiness, with which are combined desire to be united to the Church, and a reliance upon the merits of Christ. Therefore her orthodoxy was indisputable. But when in after life her brother (the Minister, Mr. Habakkuk Crabb) became heretical, either Arian or Unitarian, and his son also professed liberal opinions, she was not disturbed by these things of which she had a very slight knowledge.

CHAP. II.
—
1790-1795.

CHAPTER II.

AN ARTICLED CLERK AT COLCHESTER.

WHILE I lived as an articled clerk with Mr. Francis of Colchester, I learned the ordinary routine of an attorney's office and was absorbed in newspaper and pamphlet reading, in which religious controversy was included.

Dr. Priestley.

On religious subjects I seem very quietly to have given up my orthodoxy, and to have felt strongly for Dr. Priestley on account of the Birmingham riots; but even the orthodox Dissenters became sympathizing on that occasion. I attended a meeting of Dissenters at Chelmsford to appoint deputies to go to London to concert measures for the repeal of The Corporation and Test Act; we dined together, and among the toasts given was one in honour of Dr. Priestley and other Christian sufferers. I recollect that I was irritated by the objection of one who was present that he did not know Dr. Priestley to be a Christian. I replied that if this gentleman had read Priestley's Letter to the Swedenborgians he would have learned more of real Christianity than he seemed to know. I had myself, however, not formed any distinct religious opinions, but felt deeply the importance of religious liberty and the rights of conscience.

Through Mr. Dobson, who afterwards became a distinguished mathematician at Cambridge, I formed an acquaintance with a number of French emigrants on their escape from France during the horrors of the Revolution, and my compassion for them modified my Jacobinical feelings. I was, however, a Jacobin notwithstanding, and felt great interest in one Mr. Patmore, who was indicted for selling some of Paine's works, and ultimately escaped through a defect in the indictment. But my Journal records my shock at the death of the King of France. My French attachment expired with the Brissotine party, though in my occasional pious moods I used to pray for the French.

French Revolution.

At the Spring assizes of 1791, when I had nearly attained my sixteenth year, I had the delight of hearing Erskine. It was a high enjoyment, and I was able to profit by it. The subject of the trial was the validity of a will—Braham v. Rivett. Erskine came down specially retained for the plaintiff, and Mingay for the defendant. The trial lasted two days. The title of the heir being admitted, the proof of the will was gone into at once. I have a recollection of many of the circumstances after more than fifty-four years; but of nothing do I retain so perfect a recollection as of the figure and voice of Erskine. There was a charm in his voice, a fascination in his eye, and so completely had he won my affection that I am sure had the verdict been given against him I should have burst out crying. Of the facts and of the evidence I do not pretend to recollect anything beyond my impressions and sensations. My pocket-book records that Erskine was engaged two and a half hours in opening the case, and Mingay two hours and twenty minutes in his speech in defence. E.'s reply occupied three hours. The testatrix was an old lady in a state of imbecility. The evil spiri of the case was an attorney. Mingay was loud anc violent, and gave Erskine an opportunity of turning into ridicule his imagery and illustrations. For in stance, M. having compared R. to the Devil going int the Garden of Eden, E. drew a closer parallel than M intended. Satan's first sight of Eve was related i Milton's words—

Erskine.

> "Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
> In every gesture dignity and love;"

and then a picture of idiotcy from Swift was contrastec But the sentence that weighed on my spirits was pathetic exclamation—"If, gentlemen, you should b your verdict annihilate an instrument so solemnly framec I should retire a troubled man from this court." And a he uttered the word court, he beat his breast and I ha a difficulty in not crying out. When in bed the followin night I awoke several times in a state of excitemen approaching fever—the words "troubled man from th court" rang in my ears.

A new trial was granted, and ultimately the will wa set aside. I have said I profited by Erskine. I re marked his great artifice, if I may call it so; and in small way I afterwards practised it. It lay in his frequen repetitions. He had one or two leading arguments an main facts on which he was constantly dwelling. Bu then he had marvellous skill in varying his phraseology so that no one was sensible of tautology in the ex pressions. Like the doubling of a hare he was pe petually coming to his old place. Other great advocate

I have remarked were ambitious of a great variety of arguments.

John Wesley.

About the same time that I thus first heard the most perfect of forensic orators I was also present at an exhibition equally admirable, and which had a powerful effect on my mind. It was, I believe, in October, 1790, and not long before his death, that I heard John Wesley in the great round Meeting-house at Colchester. He stood in a wide pulpit, and on each side of him stood a minister, and the two held him up, having their hands under his armpits. His feeble voice was barely audible. But his reverend countenance, especially his long white locks, formed a picture never to be forgotten. There was a vast crowd of lovers and admirers. It was for the most part pantomime, but the pantomime went to the heart. Of the kind I never saw anything comparable to it in after life.*

The following letter enters a little more into particulars respecting this interesting occasion.

October 18th, 1790.

Dear Brother,

. . . . I felt a great Satisfaction last Week, on Monday, in hearing (excuse me now) that veteran in the Service of God, the Rev. John Wesley. I was informed in the Afternoon that he was in Town and would preach that Evening. Unfortunately a sick Man had sent to have his Will made directly, and it was given to me to write. But Mr. Francis, seeing how mortified I appeared, gave it to some one else, and I went to the Chapel. At another time, and not knowing the Man, I should almost have ridiculed his figure. Far from it now. I lookt upon him with a respect bordering upon Enthusiasm. After the people had sung one Verse of a hymn he arose, and said: "It gives me a great pleasure to find that you have not lost your Singing. Neither Men nor Women—you have not forgot a single Note. And I hope that by the assistance of the same God which enables you to sing well, you may do all other things well." A Universal Amen followed. At the End of every Head or Division of his Discourse, he finished by a kind of Prayer, a Momentary Wish as it were, not consisting of more than three or four words, which was always followed by a Universal Buzz. His discourse was short—the Text I could not hear. After the last Prayer, he rose up and addressed the People on Liberality of Sentiment, and spoke much against refusing to join with any Congregation on account of difference in Opinion. He said, "If they do but fear God, work righteousness, and keep his commandments, we have nothing to object to." He preached again on Tuesday Evening, but I was out of Town with Mr. Francis all day, holding a Court Baron. . . . . .

* I have heard Mr. R. tell this more than once at his own table, with the interesting addition that so greatly was the preacher revered that the people stood in a double line to see him as he passed through the street on his way to the chapel.—G. S.

I remain, &c.,

H. C. R.

1793.

Death of H. C. R.'s Mother.

On the 8th of January in this year died my dear mother, an excellent woman I firmly believe, though without any superiority of mind or attainments. Her worth lay in the warmth of her domestic affections, and in her unaffected simple piety. After fifty-two years I think of her with unabated esteem and regard.

1794.

Benj. Strutt.

Among my Colchester acquaintance there is one man of great ability whom I recollect with pleasure, though I was but slightly acquainted with him. This is Ben Strutt. He was a self-educated man, but having been clerk to a provincial barrister, the Recorder of the town, where he had a great deal of leisure, he had become a hard reader and so acquired a great deal of knowledge. He was a man of literature and art, and without being an attorney knew a great deal of law. He was a sort of agent to country gentlemen, particularly in elections. He published an edition of the poems of Collins, whom he praised and declared to be much superior to Gray. And I think (though I have lost the book) that it contains additional stanzas by himself to the Ode on Superstition. Strutt also painted in oil, and was skilful as a mechanic. I recollect once having a peep into his bedroom, in which were curious figures and objects which I beheld with some of the awe of ignorance. I looked up to him, and his words made an impression on me. One or two I recollect. When I went to Colchester I was very desirous of studying but I had no one to direct me, and therefore followed the routine practice and advice given to all clerks. I bought a huge folio volume to be filled with precedents, and copied therein my articles of clerkship. One evening I was writing very industriously in this volume when Ben Strutt came in. "I'm sorry to see you so lazy, young gentleman!" "Lazy! I think I'm very in-dustrious." "You do? Well now, whatever you think, let me tell you that your writing in that book is sheer laziness. You are too lazy to work as you ought with your head, and so you set your fingers at work to give your head a holiday. You know it is your duty to do something, and try to become a lawyer, and just to ease your conscience you do that. Had you been really industrious you would have studied the principles of law and carried the precedents in you head. And then you might make precedents, not follow them." I shut up the book and never wrote another line; it is still in existence,* a memorial of Strutt. Yet Mephistopheles might have given the advice, for in my case it did harm not good. S. was cynical, a free-thinker, I think an un-believer. Yet one day he said something that implied he was a churchman. "What!" I exclaimed, "you a churchman!" He laughed, "Let me give you a piece of advice, young man. Whatever you be through life always be of the Act of Parliament faith."

CHAP. II.
—
1790-1795.

I recollect a wise word of Strutt's about law. I had been repeating to him some commonplace saying that governments ought to enounce great principles, and not to interfere with men's actions, or details. "Just the contrary," growled Strutt, "Government has to do with nothing but details; of course it ought to do the right not the wrong thing, and it makes many blunders

* Yes. It was found among his books by his executors after his death. It gives evidence of great industry, accuracy, and neatness as well as order and method. On page 76 of the book is the following memorandum at the end of one of the precedents—"Wrote this April 1st, 1791, the first year of my clerkship being then finished." The book is continued to page 120, and finally stops in the middle of a precedent.

There is no use in prating about abstract rights. It is the business of Government to counsel people to do what is right." In the same spirit at another time he said, I having uttered some commonplace saying as if Locke's principles had produced the Revolution, "That's all nonsense, Locke's book was the effect, not the cause of the Revolution. People do not rebel and overset Governments because they have any ideas about liberty and right, but because they are wretched, and cannot bear what they suffer. The new Government employed Locke to justify what they had done, and to remove the scruples of weak, conscientious people." I believe I owe a great deal to Strutt, for he set me thinking, and had he been my regular instructor might have really educated me. But I saw him only now and then. I once saw him by accident in London a few years after I had left Mr. Francis. He was going to the Opera; I mentioned that I had no ear for music, least of all for Italian music. "Get it as soon as you can. You must one day love Italian music, either in this or another life. It is your business to get as much as you can here—for, as you leave off here you must begin there." This, if seriously said, implied a sort of hope of immortality very much like that of Goethe.

Ben Strutt has been many years dead. He had a son who survived him and became a painter. He made a portrait of me, a disagreeable but a strong likeness.

Jacob Pattisson.

On my becoming clerk at Colchester, only thirteen miles from Witham, I had frequent opportunities of visiting my relatives, the Isaacs, and through them I became acquainted with others. Among these was Mr.

Chap. II. — 1790-1795.

Jacob Pattisson. He had a wife whom he married late in life—a cousin, deformed in person and disfigured by the smallpox, but there was a benignity and moral beauty in her face which rendered her a universal favourite. Mr. Pattisson had only one child, who became my most intimate friend for many years, and our regard has never ceased. He is a few months younger than myself. His education had been much better than mine; when young he was at Mr. Barbauld's school. But his Dissenting connections had not been favourable to his forming acquaintance superior to himself, though his own family were wealthy. So that when he and I met at Witham each thought the other a great acquisition. Being of the same profession, having alike an earnest desire to improve, and being alike ignorant how to set about it, we knew no better expedient than to become correspondents, and I have preserved a formidable bundle of his letters, with copies of my own. I have glanced over those of the first year—we began to write in the Spring—I had hoped to find in them some references to incidents that occurred, but there is nothing of the kind. They are mere essays on abstract subjects, mine at least very ill-written and evincing no original thought whatever; law questions are discussed and criticisms on style fill many a dull page. There are also occasional bursts of Jacobin politics. It was this friend who drew my attention to the Cabinet, a Norwich periodical, and set me on fleshing my maiden sword in ink.

First Printed Essay.

It was in December, 1794, that my vanity was delighted by the appearance in print of an essay I wrote on Spies and Informers. It was published in the Cabinet, which had been got up by the young liberals of the then aspiring town of Norwich, which at that time possessed two men of eminent abilities—William Taylor and Dr. Sayers. They, however, took very little, or no part, in the Cabinet. Charles Marsh, Pitchford, Norgate and Amelia Alderson were its heroes. My essay is very ill-written, only one thought rather pompously expanded, viz., that the shame of being an informer ought to be transferred to the Law; for the detection of the breach of good laws ought to be honoured. My friend Will Pattisson was also a contributor to this periodical, under the signature of Rusticus.

Thomas Amyot.

Another friend of this period, with whom I have ever since retained an intimate acquaintance, was Thomas Amyot. At the time of my beginning a correspondence with Pattisson he was already the correspondent of Amyot. He communicated the letters of each to the other, and from first writing on Pattisson's letters we began to write to each other directly, and became correspondents without having seen each other. Amyot's letters are far the best of the whole collection, as in ability and taste he was far the superior of the three. He was the son of a watchmaker in Norwich, and clerk in the house of some eminent solicitors in that town. Our correspondence had led to an invitation to visit Amyot, and Pattisson joining me in the visit, we met at the house of Amyot's father on the 5th of December and remained there till the 9th. Within a few years of this time, Amyot married the daughter of Mr. Colman, a Norwich surgeon. He was fortunate enough to become the law agent of Mr. Windham, and when the latter became War and Colonial Minister, he offered Amyot the post of private secretary. This was readily accepted, and when after the death of his patron this place was wanted for some one else, he was appointed Registrar in London of the West India Slaves, an office which still remains, though slavery has been long abolished. Why this should be I could never learn. He became an active F.S.A., and is now (1846) Treasurer of that learned and very dull body.

CHAP. II. — 1790-1795.

Mrs. Clarkson.

The Taylors of Norwich.

Dr. Alderson.

My visit to Norwich made me also acquainted with Mrs. Clarkson, and that excellent couple Mr. and Mrs. John Taylor, the parents of a numerous family, among whom is Mrs. Austin. With several of the sons I am now in very friendly, not to say intimate relations. I was also very civilly received by Dr. Alderson, the father of Amelia, who afterwards became Mrs. Opie. I even now retain a lively recollection of this young lady's visit to Bury, and of the interest excited by her accomplishments and literary celebrity. Another person with whom I became acquainted was William Taylor, of whom I shall have occasion to write hereafter.

Trials of Hardy, Tooke, and Thelwall.

The perusal of my Journal for the year 1794 has brought a few facts to my recollection that deserve to be briefly mentioned. The chief of these are the famous State Trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. I felt an intense interest in them. During the first trial I was in a state of agitation that rendered me unfit for business. I used to beset the Post Office early, and one morning at six I obtained the London paper with "NOT GUILTY" printed in letters an inch in height, recording the issue of Hardy's trial. I ran about the town knocking at people's doors, and screaming out the joyful words.

Thomas Hardy.

Thomas Hardy, who was a shoemaker, made a sort of circuit, and obtained, of course, many an order in the way of his trade. In 1795 he visited Bury, when I also gave him an order, and I continued to employ him for many years. His acquaintance was not without its use to me, for his shop was one in which obscure patriots (like myself) became known to each other. Hardy was a good-hearted, simple and honest man. He had neither the talents nor the vices which might be supposed to belong to an acquitted traitor. He lived to an advanced age and died universally respected.

Thelwall.

Thelwall, unlike Hardy, had the weakness of vanity, but he was a perfectly honest man, and had a power of declamation which qualified him to be a mob orator. He used to say that if he were at the gallows with liberty to address the people for half an hour, he should not fear the result; he was sure he could excite them to a rescue. I became acquainted with him soon after his acquittal, and never ceased to respect him for his sincerity, though I did not think highly of his understanding. His wife, who was his good angel, was a very amiable and excellent woman. He was many years a widower, but at last married a person considerably younger than himself. Thelwall's two sons, Hampden and Sydney, became clergymen.

Chap. iii.
—
1795.

CHAPTER III.

INTERVAL AT BURY.

After leaving Colchester at Midsummer, 1795, I remained at Bury till April in the next year. During this time I had serious thoughts of being called to the Bar; it was I believe Mr. Buck who put this into my head. He had always a good opinion of me. My vivacity in conversation pleased him, and others like him entertained the very false notion that the gift of words is the main requisite for a barrister,—a vulgar error, which the marvellous success of such men as Erskine and Garrow had encouraged. I was invited to meet Mr. Capel Lofft at dinner that I might have the benefit of his opinion. He was against my being called. My acquaintance in general—among others not yet named, Walter Wright—concurred in this view, and the effect was that I neglected being entered a member of an Inn of Court; nevertheless I was averse to being an attorney, for which I was as little qualified as to be a barrister. I determined, however, to read law and occupy myself as well as I could, living meanwhile with the utmost economy. With youth, health, high spirits, and, alternating with a very low opinion of myself, a vanity which was gratified by perceiving that I could readily make my way in society, I was able to lead a busy idle life. In me was verified the strenua inertia of Horace. And in society I verified a line of the French Horace, as his countrymen term him,—

"Un sot trouve toujours un plus sot qui l'admire."

I was now, as it were, entering society, and before I relate the few incidents of the year, I will review the more remarkable of the persons I then knew.

Capel Lofft.

The most noticeable person I had ever been in company with was Capel Lofft—a gentleman of good family and estate—an author on an infinity of subjects; his books were on Law, History, Poetry, Antiquities, Divinity and Politics. He was then an acting magistrate, having abandoned the profession of the Bar. He was one of the numerous answerers of Burke; and in spite of a feeble voice and other disadvantages, an eloquent speaker. This faculty combined with his rank and literary reputation made him the object of my admiration.

Walter Wright.

Another of my acquaintances was Walter Wright. He was rather older than myself, and the object of my envy for having been at Cambridge. He had been trained for the Bar, but accepted a colonial appointment, first at Corfu and afterwards at Malta. Wright published a small volume of poems entitled Horæ Ionicæ, which Lord Byron praised warmly in his first satire. It was from this friend I used to hear of Lord Byron when his fame first arose. W. was the friend of Dallas, a barrister, and told me one day (this is anticipation) that he had been reading a MS. poem, consisting of two cantos, entitled "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," which Lord B. offered to present to Dallas

Chap. iii. — 1795.

if he thought it worth his acceptance. "I have told him," said Wright, "that I have no doubt this will succeed. Lord B. had offered him before some translations from Horace, which I told him would never sell, and he did not take them."

Walter Wright was Recorder of Bury.* He always expressed a great interest in me; and though at this time he discouraged my going to the Bar he approved of my doing so some years later.

Catherine Buck.

But of far greater influence over me was the family of Mr. Buck. And among these the one to whom I was most devoted was his eldest daughter Catherine. She was three years older than I. Being the playfellow of her brother John, who was of my own age, I soon became intimate at the house; as I was perhaps the most promising of her brother's playfellows, Catherine took me in hand to bring me forward. I have very severe letters from her, reproaching me for slovenliness in dress, as well as rudeness of behaviour. But at the same time she lent me books, made me first acquainted with the new opinions that were then afloat, and was my oracle till her marriage with the then celebrated Thomas Clarkson, the founder of the Society for the abolition of the slave-trade. After her marriage she quitted Bury, but our friendship never ceased, and her name will frequently occur in these reminiscences. Catherine Buck was the most eloquent woman I have ever known, with the exception of Madame de Staël. She had a quick apprehension of every kind of beauty,

* This seems to be an error. John Symonds, LL.D., was Recorder at this period.

and made her own whatever she learned. She introduced me to Lamb, Coleridge, Wordsworth, &c.*

Sarah Jane Maling.

Catherine Buck had an intimate friend in Sarah Jane Maling, a person rather older than herself and of much originality of mind and character. She was also one of my friends.

Godwin's Political Justice.

It was in the spring of this year and before I left Colchester that I read a book which gave a turn to my mind, and in effect directed the whole course of my life —a book which, after producing a powerful effect on the youth of that generation, has now sunk into unmerited oblivion. This was Godwin's Political Justice. I was in some measure prepared for it by an acquaintance with Holcroft's novels, and it came recommended to me by the praise of Catherine Buck. I entered fully into its spirit, it left all others behind in my admiration, and I was willing even to become a martyr for it; for it soon became a reproach to be a follower of Godwin, on account of his supposed atheism. I never became an atheist, but I could not feel aversion or contempt

* She felt it to be, as she herself expresses it, "a prodigious disadvantage to a man not to have had a sister." But in Mr. Robinson's case she did her utmost to make up the deficiency. Indeed, few elder sisters have done more for a brother than she seems to have done for her friend. He had so much esteem for her judgment and such a perfect reliance on the genuine kindness which actuated all her conduct towards him that there was no danger of offence or misunderstanding when she pointed out his weakness or faults, and expressed her anxiety as to the effect of any pursuit on his character or on his health. "There are many points," she says, "in which from the circumstances in which you have been placed, the habit of feeling you have acquired is not like that of other people," but she adds, "of all those whom I knew in childhood or youth you are the only one who has retained any likeness to myself; and you are so like that I wonder how it is possible that you can be so different."

Chap. iii. — 1795.

towards G. on account of any of his views. In one respect the book had an excellent effect on my mind—it made me feel more generously. I had never before, nor, I am afraid, have I ever since felt so strongly the duty of not living to one's self, but of having for one's sole object the good of the community. His idea of justice I then adopted and still retain; nor was I alarmed by the declamations so generally uttered against his opinions on the obligations of gratitude, the fulfilment of promises, and the duties arising out of the personal relations of life. I perceived then the difference between principles as universal laws, and maxims of conduct as prudential rules. And I thought myself qualified to be his defender, for which purpose I wrote a paper which was printed in Flower's Cambridge Intelligencer. But one practical effect of Godwin's book was to make me less inclined to follow the law, or any other profession as a means of livelihood. I determined to practise habits of rigid economy, and then I thought my small income would suffice with such additions as might be gained by literature.

In the autumn of this year I was led to take a part in public matters, and from its being the first act of the kind, I may here relate it. In consequence of Kyd Wake's* attack upon the King two Acts were introduced, called the Pitt and Grenville Acts for better securing the

* Kyd Wake, a journeyman printer, was convicted for insulting the King in his state carriage, and sentenced to stand an hour in the pillory each day for three months and to be imprisoned for five years. The "Treason" and "Sedition" Bills were laid before Parliament Nov. 6 and Nov. 10, 1795. See Stanhope's "Life of Wm. Pitt," vol. 2, page 358.

CHAP. III.

1795.

The Pitt and Grenville Acts.

King's person. They were deemed an infringement on the constitution, and in every part of the kingdom petitions were prepared against them and public meetings held. The drawing up of the petition and obtaining signatures at Bury were intrusted to Walter Wright and myself. I was very active, but nevertheless impartial enough to see all that was foolish in the business, and it is a satisfaction to me to recollect the great glee with which I read Johnson's admirable satirical account of a petition in his "False Alarm." I have pleasure also in remembering that even while I was a partisan of the French Revolution I was an admirer of Burke, not merely for his eloquence, but also for his philosophy. It was after the Bury petition had been prepared that a county meeting was held at Stowmarket. Mr. Grigby was in the chair; the Whig Baronets Sir W. Middleton and Sir W. Rowley attended; but the hero of the day was Capel Lofft. He spoke at great length, and as I thought, very admirably. His voice was sweet, though feeble. He was the only orator I had heard except at the Bar and in the Pulpit. The Whig gentry became impatient and at length retired, but by way of compromise, after Mr. Lofft's resolutions had been passed, the Bury petition was clamorously called for. Towards the end of the proceedings, I got upon the waggon and was endeavouring to prompt Mr. Lofft to move a vote of thanks, when he suddenly introduced me to the meeting, as one to whom the county was greatly indebted as the author of the petition. This little incident served as a sort of precocious introduction to public life.

CHAP. IV.
—
1796.

CHAPTER IV.

1796—1800. UNSETTLED LIFE IN LONDON.

ON the 20th of April I went to London with the intention of entering an attorney's office in order to qualify myself for practice. This step was taken, not on account of my having less dislike to the law as a profession, but because friends urged me, and because I was unwilling to remain idle any longer. My lodgings were of a simple kind, in Drury Lane, and my expenses not more than about a guinea a week; but a first residence in London cannot be otherwise than a kind of epoch in life.

John T. Rutt.

Among the new acquaintance which I formed there is one of whom I was proud, and to whom I feel considerable obligation—John Towill Rutt. He was the son of an affluent drug-grinder, and might possibly have himself died rich if he had not been a man of too much literary taste, public spirit, and religious zeal to be able to devote his best energies to business. He was brought up an orthodox dissenter, and married into a family of like sentiments. His wife was an elder sister of Mrs. Thomas Isaac, daughter of Mr. Pattisson of Malden and first cousin of my friend William Pattisson. I was therefore doubly introduced to him. I had the good fortune to please him, and he became my chief friend. He had become a Unitarian, and was a leading member of the Gravel-Pit congregation, Hackney, of which Belsham was the pastor. Mr. Rutt was the friend and biographer of Gilbert Wakefield and of Priestley. He also edited the entire works of the latter. He was proud of having been, with Lord Grey, an original member of the Society of the Friends of the People. The eldest daughter of his large family is the widow of the late Sir T. N. Talfourd.

My days were spent in attending the courts with very little profit. I heard Erskine frequently, and my admiration of him was confirmed; but I acquired no fresh impression concerning him.

I tried to procure a suitable situation but without success; and this, with an almost morbid feeling of my own ignorance, made me more unhappy than I had been before, or ever was afterwards. Thus discouraged, I returned to Bury in the summer. My brother's marriage, which took place soon afterwards, was the cause of my being introduced to an entirely new connection—the Fordhams and Nashes of Royston. The most prominent of the former for wealth and personal character was Edward King Fordham, a remarkable man, who retained his bodily and mental vigour to a great age. Of all these new friends the one to whom I became most indebted was Mr. William Nash, an eminent solicitor and a first-rate character in the sphere in which he moved. Both of these families were liberal in religious opinion and zealous for political reform. There had been established at Royston a book-club, and twice a year the members of it were invited to a tea-party

William Nash.

Royston Book Club.

CHAP. IV.
—
1796.

at the largest room the little town supplied, and a regular debate was held. In former times this debate had been honoured by the participation of no less a man than Robert Hall. My friend J. T. Rutt and Benjamin Flower, the ultra-liberal proprietor and editor of the Cambridge Intelligencer, had also taken part. To one of these meetings my brother was invited and I as a sort of satellite to him. There was a company of forty-four gentlemen and forty-two ladies. The question discussed was, "Is private affection inconsistent with universal benevolence?" Not a disputable point, but it was meant to involve the merits of Godwin as a philosopher, and as I had thought, or rather talked much about him, I had an advantage over most of those who were present. I have no doubt that what I said was, in truth, poor stuff, but I was very young, had great vivacity and an abundance of words. Among the speakers were Benjamin Flower, Mr. Rutt, and four or five ministers of the best reputation in the place; yet I obtained credit, and the solid benefit of the good opinion and kindness of Mr. Nash. He was told of my unsettled state and my want of an introduction in London. He did not offer to be of any practical use, perhaps had not the means, but his advice was emphatically given in the words, "Fag, fag, fag." By laborious fagging he had raised himself to wealth and distinction.

On my return to my old London quarters in October I entered a solicitor's office on the condition of nothing being paid on either side. This was Mr. White's office in Chancery Lane. My occupation was almost entirely mechanical, and therefore of no great advantage to me. My leisure was devoted partly to legal and miscellaneous reading, from which I derived little profit, and partly to attending debating societies, which afforded me practice in public speaking, and thus materially contributed to my moderate success in life. At the meetings of one of these societies I frequently had, as an adversary, John Gale Jones. At those of another, to which Mr. Rutt introduced me, and which was presided over by Belsham, I formed a life-long friendship with Mr. Anthony Robinson, whose powers of conversation were far greater than those of any other of my acquaintance.

Anthony Robinson.

1797.

The Servile Year.

I have spent several days in deciphering a short-hand journal, and looking over a collection of letters belonging to this year; an employment that must have humiliated me, if after half a century it were possible to have a strong sense of personal identity. Thus much I must say—that if "the child" (in this instance the youth) be "father of the man," I must plead guilty to the impiety of despising my parent.

How long I should have gone on in my mechanical work there is no guessing had not an accident relieved me.

There came to the office one day a clerk who was going to leave his situation at Mr. Hoper's (Boyle Street, Saville Row), and he advised me to apply for it, which I did, and was accepted as a conveyancing clerk at a Clerk at Mr. Hoper's.

CHAP. IV.
—
1797.

guinea a week. I went on the 5th of April. At the end of three weeks, however, my employer told me he should no longer need my services, but had recommended me to a better place than his. This was in the office of Mr. Joseph Hill, of Saville Row, with whom I remained from the 28th of April till my uncle's death at the close of the year. Mr. Hill's name appears in the Life of Cowper, whose particular friend he was. He had no general law practice, but was steward to several noblemen. All I had to do was to copy letters, make schedules of deeds and keep accounts. My service was light but by no means favourable to my advancement in legal knowledge. I attended from half-past nine or ten till five, and had therefore leisure for reading. The treatment I received was kind, though I was kept at a distance. Mr. Hill seemed to have an interest in my welfare, and gave me good counsel. He had a country house at Wargrave, on the Thames, and was frequently absent for weeks together in the summer. When he was in London he sent me very nice meat luncheons, which usually served me for dinner. On the whole I was not at all uncomfortable, and should have been even happy if I could have kept out of my thoughts the consideration that I was, after all, it was to be hoped, fit for something better than to be a writing-clerk at a guinea a week.

Clerk at Mr. Joseph Hill's.

On going to Mr. Hoper's I removed from Drury Lane to small and neat rooms on the second floor at 20 Sherrard Street. One of my principal amusements was the theatre. I had great pleasure in the acting of Mrs. Jordan and others, but my admiration for Mrs.

Siddons was boundless. One little anecdote concerning her effect upon me has been printed in Campbell's life of her. I had told it to Charles Young and he thought he was at liberty to repeat it for publication.

Mrs. Siddons.

The play was "Fatal Curiosity," acted for her benefit. In the scene in which her son having put into her hands a casket to keep, and she having touched a spring it opens and she sees jewels—her husband (Kemble) enters, and in despair exclaims "Where shall we get bread?" With her eyes fixed on the jewels, she runs to him, knocks the casket against her breast and exclaims, "Here! Here!" In Mrs. Siddons' tone and in her look there was an anticipation of the murder which was to take place. I burst out into a loud laugh, which occasioned a cry of "Turn him out!" This cry frightened me, but I could not refrain. A good-natured woman near me called out "Poor young man, he cannot help it." She gave me a smelling-bottle which restored me, but I was quite shaken, and could not relish the little comedy of "The Deuce is in him," though Mrs. Siddons played in it. I thought her humour forced, and every expression overdone. By the bye, the title of the piece may have been "Diamond cut Diamond." It is the only piece in which I did not admire Mrs. Siddons.

The Forum.

The Forums were a source of great enjoyment to me. They exercised my mind, and whatever faculty of public speaking I afterwards possessed I acquired at these places. If the attention my speeches received from others may be regarded as a criterion my progress seems to have been very considerable. In general the speakers were not men of culture or refinement. There was one, however, of extreme liberal opinions who was distinguished from all others by an aristocratic air. His voice was weak but pleasing, and his tone that of a high-bred gentleman. Some compliments paid me by him were particularly acceptable. He was accompanied by his wife, one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen. On one occasion I chanced to sit next to her and a very lively and agreeable lady who accompanied her. No gentleman was with them. She asked me whether I did not know Hardy the patriot; and as she seemed to know me, I ventured to offer my services in procuring them a carriage. But none was to be had, and so I saw them safely home. In a few days I had a call from her husband, Mr. Collier, to thank me for my attention. Thus began an acquaintance, which lasted through life and was to me of inestimable value. The Colliers passed through great changes of fortune, but if I had it in my power to render them any service or kindness I have always felt it to be very far below what they rendered to me. Perhaps they thought otherwise —it is well when persons can so estimate their relation to each other.

CHAP. IV.
—
1797.

Mr. and Mrs. Collier.

In some money transactions that passed between Mr. C. and me, the only dispute we ever had was that each wished to give the other some advantage which he would not take. The eldest son, John Payne Collier, the editor of Shakespeare, is now one of my most respected friends. The parents have long been dead.

Gamaliel Lloyd.

At the Westminster Forum late in the year I made a successful speech on the French Revolution, and among those present was one of the most respectable inhabitants of Bury, Gamaliel Lloyd, a gentleman of fortune—a Whig of the old school, a friend of Cartwright and Wyvill as well as Capel Lofft. I knew him merely by meeting him at the Bury Library. He complimented me on this occasion, and an invitation to his lodgings was the origin of an acquaintance of which I was proud. He was a fine specimen of the Yorkshire gentry. He has long been dead, leaving as his present representative William Horton Lloyd, a most respectable man. Leonard Horner is the husband of G. L.'s second daughter. One of her daughters will probably be hereafter Lady Bunbury; another is married to Sir Charles Lyell.

My old friend Pattisson lodged in Carey Street. We saw each other daily, and in order to avoid missing each other we agreed always to pass through certain streets between our two abodes. I recollect with tenderness how many hours of comfort and enjoyment I owed to his companionship. At his apartments I became acquainted with Richard Taylor, the eminent printer and common-council man.

1798.

Death of H. C. R.'s uncle.

On the first of January in this year I received the news of the death of my uncle Robinson. He was good natured and liberal, and richer than any other relation. His property was left to my brothers and myself. I soon ascertained that I should have about a hundred pounds per annum. A very poor income for a student aspiring to the Bar; a comfortable independence to fall back upon for one content to live humbly as a literary man. Between a legal and a literary occupation I was unable at once to determine. All I resolved on for the present was to quit Mr. Hill. With him I was idling away my time and learning nothing. I remained with him till the 5th of March, when he was able to procure a successor. He dismissed me with good advice, counselling me to lead a life of business, and warning me against indulging in habits of speculation. This he said in a parental way. I met him afterwards in the streets, but was never recognized by him.

CHAP. IV.
—
1798.

On the 6th of May I went down to Bury and did not return till October. In the interval I made a visit to Norwich and Yarmouth. At the latter place I stayed four weeks. My main inducement was to read to Harley, a blind man I became acquainted with through Miss Maling. An interesting man in humble circumstances. At Yarmouth also I fell in with two young men about to go to Germany to study. One afterwards became famous, Captain Parry, the traveller and discoverer in the Polar regions.

William Taylor.

But the most eventful occurrence of the year was an introduction to William Taylor of Norwich, who encouraged in me a growing taste for German literature.

I had already thought of a visit to Germany, and my desire to go was very much strengthened. But it proceeded chiefly from dissatisfaction with my present pursuits, and from a vague wish to be where I was not.

What I have written about my general occupations in 1797 is applicable to a large part of this year. I went on reading in a desultory way. Books were oddly jumbled together in my brain. I took a few lessons in German.

Robert Hall.

In my visit to Bury I found I had already acquired a bad character for free thinking. This led to a correspondence between the famous Robt. Hall and me. I heard that he had told Mr. Nash it was disgraceful to him as a Christian to admit me into his house. I remonstrated with Mr. Hall for this officious interference, and asked him why he had defamed me. He answered me in a letter, which I have preserved as a curiosity. It is an excellent letter of the kind. He said he believed me to be a professor of infidelity, of pantheism, and therefore as became him he warned a Christian brother of the peril of intercourse with me. On his own principles he was right. My letter I have also preserved. It is as ill as his is well written.

To the Rev. R. Hall.

Yarmouth, 30th Aug., 1798.

Sir,

Your own good sense will suggest every apology necessary for troubling you with this unpleasant letter. Unpleasant it certainly is for me to write, and it will be more or less so for you to receive, as your recollection may echo the observations I have to make. I am informed that you have of late distinguished yourself by displaying much zeal against certain very prevalent speculative opinions. And I am also told that in connection with such subjects you have thought proper frequently and generally to introduce my name and 1798.

CHAP. IV.
—

Letter to Robert Hall.

character. Recollecting probably the great secret of poetry, where beauty and effect consist in the lively representation of individual objects, you have, it seems, found it convenient to point the sting of your denunciation by setting the mark of censure and reprobation on my forehead. I hear too that you have travelled amongst my friends in a neighbouring county, urging them no longer to honour me with their friendship, and declaring it to be a disgrace to them to admit me into their houses. I will name but one person, and that a gentleman for whom I feel the warmest sensations of esteem and love; and the loss of whose good opinion I should consider as a very serious privation, Mr. Nash, of Royston. And this style I understand you scruple not to hold in large and mixed companies, where I am of course unknown, and where only, I flatter myself, your labours could be successful. Indeed, Sir, I as little deserve the honour of such notice from you as I do the disgrace of so much obloquy. But not having so much of the childish vanity of being talked about, as of the honourable desire to be esteemed by the truly respectable, I am compelled to remonstrate with you, and call upon you for some reason why you have thus made an attack, in its possible consequences incalculably injurious to the reputation of a young man, who is an entire stranger to you. Were I addressing a man of the world, I know that what I have written is vague enough to allow room for evasion and prevarication, for a denial of having used the precise terms stated, and for a demand of my authors. But I recollect that you have adopted a profession of high pretensions, and that it is probable you will excuse yourself on the ground of performing a religious duty. As such you cannot scruple to inform me what more and worse things you have said—particularly what opinions they are which excite so much anger, and what authority you have for imputing them to me. I do not accuse you of personal malignity, but I charge you with wantonly casting arrows and death. And it matters not to the sufferer whether sport or false zeal direct the aim. I do not think you capable of inventing calumny; but it seems that you have heedlessly built opinions on vague report, drawn unwarrantable inferences from general appellations, and carelessly trifled with the happiness of others as objects below your regard. Constitutionally enthusiastic, I have warmly expressed, perhaps without enow limitations, my high admiration of the "Political Justice." Hence, I suspect, all the misapprehension. I was told by a gentleman who knows you well, that so inveterate was your rage against Mr. Godwin, that when any incident of unnatural depravity or abandoned profligacy was mentioned, your exclamation has been, "I could not have supposed any man capable of such an action, except Godwin." Excuse me when I add, that had this been told me of a stranger, I should have felt great contempt for him. I could not despise Mr. Hall; and therefore it only added one more to the list of examples which prove a most important truth, that the possession of the greatest talents is no security against the grossest absurdities and weaknesses. I do not chuse to consider this as an exculpatory letter, and therefore I will not state why I admire the "Political Justice;" but as I understand that the sprinkling I have felt is but a spray of the torrent cast on poor Godwin, it is hardly irrelevant for me to remark, that such intemperate abuse will be received by some with stupid and vulgar applause, and by others with pity and regret. I am anxious you should not mistake me. I believe your motives, so far as you could be conscious of them, were good; that zeal (always respectable whatever be its object) alone impelled you; but I fear that, like most zealots, your views were confined and partial, and that, eager to do your duty towards your God, you forgot what you owed to your neighbour; that your imagination, forcibly excited by passion, waited not for the dull enquiry, the tedious discrimination of your judgment; and that you reasoned absurdly, because you felt passionately. R. is a Godwinite—therefore an atheist—therefore incapable of virtuous habits or benevolent feelings—therefore disposed only to commit crimes and make proselytes—therefore I ought to use my appropriate weapons of excommunication by exciting against him both his friends and strangers, and deprive him of all power to do injury by blasting his reputation, and making him an object of hatred and contempt. Thus, by the ruin of one, I shall save many. Something of this kind, tho' certainly short of its extent, has probably influenced you. However, giving you credit for integrity and benevolence, of which I shall be better able to judge hereafter, I remain, without enmity, and with respect for your general character,

Chap. iv. — 1798.

Yours, &c.
H. C. R.

TO MR. HENRY ROBINSON.

Octr. 13, 1798. Cambridge.

Sir,

Letter from Robert Hall.

That I have not paid to your frank and manly letter the prompt and respectful attention it deserved, my only apology is a variety of perplexing incidents which have left me till now little leisure or spirits.

Before I proceed to justify my conduct, I will state to you very briefly the information on which it was founded, not doubting that where I may seem to usurp the office of a censor you will attribute it to the necessity of self-defence.

I have been led to believe you make no scruple on all occasions to avow your religious scepticism, that you have publicly professed your high admiration of the "Political Justice," even to the length of declaring, I believe at the Royston Book Club, that no man ever understood the nature of virtue so well as Mr. Godwin; from which I have drawn the following inference — either that you disbelieve the being of God and a future state, or that admitting them to be true, in your opinion they have no connection with the nature of virtue; the first of which is direct and avowed, the second practical atheism. For whether there be a God is merely a question of curious speculation unless the belief in Him be allowed to direct and enforce the practice of virtue. The theopathetic affections, such as love, reverence, resignation, &c., form in the estimation of all theists a very sublime and important class of virtues. Mr. Godwin as a professed atheist is very consistent in excluding them from his catalogue; but how he who does so can be allowed best to understand the nature of virtue, by any man who is not himself an atheist, I am at a loss to conceive.

Chap. iv.
1798.

A person of undoubted veracity assured me that on being gently reprimanded by a lady for taking the name of God in vain in a certain company, you apologized by exhibiting such an idea of God as appeared to him to coincide with the system of Spinoza, in which everything is God, and God is everything. Since the receipt of your letter I applied to this gentleman, who confirms his first information, but is concerned at having mentioned the circumstance, as it might be construed into an abuse of the confidence of private conversation. You will oblige me by not compelling me to give up his name. Of this you may rest satisfied, he will make no ungenerous use of this incident, and that his character is at the utmost removed from that of a calumniator. He will not affirm the sentiments you uttered were serious; they might be a casual effort of sportive ingenuity, but their coincidence with other circumstances before mentioned strengthened my former impressions.

More recently I have been told your chief objection to the system of Godwin is an apprehension of its being too delicate and refined for the present corrupt state of society; which from a person of your acknowledged good sense surprised me much, because the most striking and original part of his system, that to which he ascends, through the intermediate stages, as the highest point of perfection—the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes—has been uniformly acted upon by all four-footed creatures from the beginning of the world.

In another particular I am sincerely glad to find myself mistaken. From a late conversation with Mr. Ebenezer Foster, I was induced to suppose you had been at pains to infuse into his mind atheistical doubts. I retract this opinion with pleasure as founded on misapprehension. Having no reason to doubt of your honour, your disavowal of any opinion will be perfectly satisfactory. I will repeat that disavowal to any person whom I may have unintentionally misled.

In exonerating me from the suspicion of being actuated by personal malignity, you have done me justice; but you have formed an exaggerated idea of those circumstances in my conduct which wear the appearance of hostility. Your moral character has been unimpeached. I have neither invented nor circulated slander. On the contrary, when I have expressed myself with the greatest freedom, I have been careful to premise that I had no personal acquaintance with you, that your manners might for anything I knew be correct, and that all the censure attached or fear expressed was confined to the licentious opinions I understood you to embrace. I have never travelled a mile on your account. My efforts have been confined to an attempt within a very limited circle (for it is in a very limited circle I move) to warn some young people against forming a close intimacy with a person who by the possession of the most captivating talents was likely to give circulation and effect to the most dangerous errors. As you allude to a conversation with Mr. Nash (whom in common with you I highly esteem), I will relate it to you as nearly as my recollection will serve. After a sort of desultory debate on heresy and scepticism, he told me he designed at your next visit to Royston to request you to make his house your home. Warmed in a degree, though not irritated by the preceding dispute, I replied it was all very proper considering him as a man of the world, but considering him as a Christian it was very unprincipled,—an expression of greater asperity, I will allow, than either politeness to him or delicacy to you will perfectly justify. I conceived myself at liberty to express my sentiments the more freely to Mr. Nash because he is a member and an officer in our Church.

CHAP. IV.
—
1798.

I have ventured repeatedly to express my apprehension of baneful consequences arising from your attendance at the book-club, where if your principles be such as I have supposed, you have a signal opportunity, from the concourse of young people assembled, of extending the triumph of the new philosophy.

Such, as far as my recollection reaches, is the faithful sketch of those parts of my conduct which have provoked your displeasure.

To make an attack in its possible consequences incalculably injurious, to seek the salvation of others by your ruin, are the gigantic efforts of a powerful malignity, equally remote from my inclination and ability. The rapid increase of irreligion among the polite and fashionable, and descending of late to the lower classes, has placed serious believers so entirely on the defensive, that they will think themselves happy if they can be secure from contempt and insult.

How far a regard to speculative opinion ought to regulate the choice of our friendships, is a delicate question never likely to be adjusted harmoniously by two persons who think so differently of the importance of truth and the mischief of error. Principles of irreligion, recommended by brilliant and seductive talents, appear to me more dangerous in the intercourse of private life than licentious manners.

Vice is a downcast, self-accusing culprit; error often assumes an appearance which captivates and dazzles. The errors—or rather the atrocious speculations—of Godwin's system are big with incalculable mischief. They confound all the duties and perplex all the relations of human life: they innovate in the very substance of virtue, about which philosophers of all sects have been nearly agreed. They render vice systematic and concerted; and by freeing the conscience from every restraint, and teaching men to mock at futurity, they cut off from the criminal and misguided the very possibility of retreat. Atheism in every form I abhor, but even atheism has received from Godwin new degrees of deformity, and wears a more wild and savage aspect. I am firmly of opinion the avowal of such a system, accompanied with an attempt to proselyte, ought not to be tolerated in the state, much less be permitted to enter the recesses of private life, to pollute the springs of domestic happiness or taint the purity of confidential intercourse. For the first of these sentiments, Mr. Godwin's disciples will doubtless regard me with ineffable contempt; a contempt which I am prepared to encounter, shielded by the authority of all pagan antiquity, as well as by the decided support of Mr. Locke, the first of Christian philosophers and political reasoners.

CHAP. IV. — 1798.

I appeal to a still higher authority for the last, to those Scriptures which as a Christian minister I am solemnly pledged not only to explain and inculcate, but to take for the standards of my own faith and practice.

The Scriptures forbid the disciples of Christ to form any near relation, any intimate bond of union, with professed infidels. "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness, and what concord hath Christ with Belial, and what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? Wherefore come out from amongst them and be ye separate, saith the Lord." If it be urged that this precept primarily respects the case of marriage with an infidel, it is obvious to reply that the reason of marriage with such persons being prohibited is the intimate friendship which such union implies.

I am, Sir,

Your humble servant,

R. HALL.

1799.

When I became a professed follower of Godwin as a moral philosopher I could not but be also an admirer of his ally Holcroft, whose novels "Anna St. Ives" and "Hugh Trevor" I had read with avidity; and I had thought his conduct noble in surrendering himself in court when the trial of Thomas Hardy began. I was introduced to Holcroft by Collier, but the acquaintance never flourished. I was present, however, at a remarkable dinner at his house (14th March). Aicken, of the Drury Lane company, highly respectable both as a man and an actor, and Sharp the engraver, were there. The latter is still named as one of the most eminent of English engravers; he is at the head of the English school. I possess one of his works which is a masterpiece—"The Doctors of the Church" by Guido. I am no connoisseur certainly, and perhaps have no delicate sense of the beauty of engraving; but I never look on this specimen without a lively pleasure. Sharp was equally well known in another character which I will exemplify by an anecdote from the lips of Flaxman. "After Brothers had rendered himself by his insanity the object of universal interest, to which publicity had been given by the motion of Halked in the House of Commons, I had a visit from my old friend Sharp. 'I am come,' said he, 'to speak to you on a matter of some importance. You are aware of the great mission with which the Lord has intrusted Brothers?' I intimated that I had heard what everybody else had heard. 'Well,' he continued, 'perhaps you have not heard that I am to Holcroft.

Sharp the Engraver.

Chap. iv.
—
1799.

accompany the Children of Israel on their taking possession of their country, the Holy Land. Indeed, I think I shall have much to do in the transplanting of the nation. I have received my instructions, and I have to inform you that you also are to accompany them. I know from authority that you are of the seed of Abraham.' I bowed and intimated my sense of the honour done me by the invitation, but said it was quite impossible. I had other duties set out for me. On my return from Rome, I bought this house, and established myself here, and here I must maintain myself and my family. 'I am aware of all that,' said Sharp, 'and I have arranged everything. I know very well you are a great artist, I know too that you are a great architect as well as a great sculptor. I shall have intrusted to me the office of making all the chief appointments on this journey, and I pledge myself that you shall have the rebuilding of the Temple.'"

Sharp and Flaxman.

The same mental delusion showed itself at the dinner at Holcroft's. On leaving the table Sharp called his host out of the room to say that Buonaparte was quite safe —it was communicated to him last night by authority. There had been a great battle yesterday in Germany. Sharp was one of the objects of suspicion to the English Government during the famous trials of 1794. He was a violent Jacobin and an extreme and passionate partisan of the Republicans. There is to be met with in the cabinets of the curious an admired engraving by him of Thomas Paine, as also of Brothers, whom he regarded as the messenger and sent of God.*

* Sharp's engraving of "Richard Brothers, Prince of the Hebrews," is a

CHAP. IV.

1799.

The French Revolution.

It is well known that the French Revolution turned the brains of many of the noblest youths in England. Indeed, when such men as Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, caught the infection, no wonder that those who partook of their sensibility but had a very small portion of their intellect were carried away. Many were ruined by the errors into which they were betrayed; many also lived to smile at the follies of their youth. "I am no more ashamed of having been a republican," said Southey, "than I am of having been a child." The opinions held led to many political prosecutions, and I naturally had much sympathy with the sufferers. I find in my journal, February 21st, 1799, "An interesting and memorable day." It was the day on which Gilbert Wakefield was convicted of a seditious libel and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. This he suffered in Dorchester gaol, which he left only to die. Originally of the Established Church, he became a Unitarian, and professor at the Hackney College. By profession he was a scholar. His best known work was an edition of "Lucretius." He had written against Porson's edition of the "Hecuba of Euripides."* It is said that Porson was at a dinner-party at which toasts were going round; and a name, accompanied by an appropriate sentence from Shakespeare, was required from each of the guests in succession. Before Porson's turn came he had disappeared beneath the table and was supposed to be Gilbert Wakefield.

small square, dated 1795. Below it is inscribed: "Fully believing this to be the Man whom GOD has appointed, I engrave his likeness.—WILLIAM SHARP."

* In Euripidis Hecubam Londini nuper publicatam Diatribe Extemporalis. 1797.

CHAP. IV. — 1799.

insensible to what was going on. This, however, was not the case, for when a toast was required of him, he staggered up and gave "Gilbert Wakefield!—what's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba?" Wakefield was a political fanatic. He had the pale complexion and mild features of a saint, was a most gentle creature in domestic life, and a very amiable man; but when he took part in political or religious controversy his pen was dipped in gall. The occasion of the imprisonment before alluded to was a letter in reply to Watson, the Bishop of Llandaff, who had written a pamphlet exhorting the people to loyalty. Wakefield asserted that the poor, the labouring classes, could lose nothing by French conquest. Referring to the fable of the Ass and the Trumpeter he said, "Will the enemy make me carry two panniers?" and declared that if the French came they would find him at his post with the illustrious dead.

The prosecution was not intemperate, but he gloried in what he had done, and was actuated by the spirit of martyrdom. Nothing could be more injudicious than his defence, though in a similar trial an example had been set him just before by Erskine of what such a defence should be. My friend Rutt was one of Wakefield's bail. On being brought up for judgment he spoke in mitigation, but in a way which aggravated the offence. I accompanied him in a hackney-coach to the King's Bench prison. While his friends were arranging with the Governor about rooms there were brought to the prison two young men named Parry, editors of The Courier newspaper, who had been sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment for a libel on the Emperor of Russia. The libel consisted in a simple paragraph, stating that the Emperor had acted oppressively and made himself unpopular with the nobility by a late decree prohibiting the importation of timber. Such was the liberty of the Press in the days of William Pitt!

H. C. R. TO T. ROBINSON.

(No date.)

Dear Thomas,

. . . . One of the most interesting occurrences here has been Wakefield's trial. How I wished that you had been here then! My acquaintance with him perhaps heightened the effect; but I think to a mere stranger his delivery of his own defence must have been one of the most gratifying treats which a person of taste or sensibility could enjoy. His simplicity quite apostolic, his courage purely heroic. The energy and dignity with which he conducted himself have certainly had no parallel of late years. You saw a report of his speech in The Courier. It certainly was not a good defence, but as Anthony Robinson observed, something better than any defence—a noble testimony. I dined in company with him on Monday and yesterday. His spirits are not in the least depressed.

Johnson the Publisher.

Johnson, the Unitarian publisher in St. Paul's Churchyard, was convicted of a libel for selling Wakefield's pamphlet; he was imprisoned in the King's Bench for a few months. For a consideration he was allowed to occupy apartments within the rules. My first visit to him in prison was in company with Mary Hays,*

* She professed Mary Wollstonecraft's opinions with more zeal than discrea very zealous political and moral reformer, a friend of Mary Wollstonecraft, and author of a novel called "Memoirs of Emma Courtney." I called on Johnson several times and profited by his advice. He was a wise man, and his remarks on the evil of indulging in melancholy forebodings were applicable to a habit of my own. He described them as the effect of dreamy indolence, and as liable to increase from the unhealthy state into which they bring the mind. Though he did not cure me of my fault, some of its consequences were mitigated. I was especially unhappy from my inability to come to any satisfactory conclusion as to my plan of life. I hated the law, yet I knew not how otherwise to attain any social station. I was ambitious of literary distinction, but was conscious that I could never attain any reputation worth having. My desire to go to Germany was rather a pis aller, than from any decided preference of the comparative advantages of such a course.

One other political prisoner occasionally visited by me was Benjamin Flower, who had been committed to Newgate by the House of Lords for a breach of privilege.

H. C. R. TO HIS BROTHER.

(About) June, 1799.

My dear Brother,

. . . . I suppose the fame of "Pizarro" has already reached you. It is unquestionably the most excellent play I ever saw for variety of attractions. The tion. This brought her into disrepute among the rigid, and her character suffered—but most undeservedly. Whatever her principles may have been, her conduct was perfectly correct. My acquaintance with her continued till her death.—H. C. R.

Chap. iv. — 1799.

Mrs. Siddons and Kemble in Pizarro.

scenery and decorations are splendid and magnificent without being tawdry or puerile, and these ornaments are made to heighten, not supersede, real dramatic merit. The tragedy possesses scenes of the most tender and pathetic kind, and others highly heroic. Mrs. Siddons displays her usual powers in the character of the mistress of Pizarro—proud, haughty, with a true sense of honour and a romantic passion for glory; in love with Pizarro because he was great, she hates him when he degrades himself by acts of meanness—herself a criminal, her passion for humanity leads her to acts of heroism and desperation. Kemble plays the Peruvian Chieftain in his very best style. The lover of Cora, he voluntarily yields her to Alonzo, and when they are married, devotes his life to their happiness; brave, generous, and pious, he is a kind of demi-god,—and you know with what skill Kemble can "assume the god and try to shake the spheres." The incidents are in themselves so highly interesting and extraordinary that far less superiority of acting and pomp of machinery would have given ordinary effect to the piece; but, when united with the utmost efforts of the Painter and Machinist, they produce a drama absolutely without parallel. Were you a little richer I should recommend a journey to London on purpose to see it.

I have also been greatly amused by hearing one of Mackintosh's lectures. It was on the British Constitution. Though his praise of the British Constitution was extravagant, he was far from being uniformly favourable to the cause of Government. His favourite notion concerning the Constitution is, that it is the most truly democratic of any that has ever existed. He defines a real democracy to be a government where the opinion of the body of the people influences and governs the State, whatever the nominal legislature may be. And he boldly asserts that a more formal democracy would lessen the real democracy, because it is the nature of all mobs and public assemblies to be under the secret guidance of factious demagogues; and that the people in such states never act, precisely because they are the direct actors, and have a power nominally given them which they cannot exercise. He urged the common argument in favour of Monarchy, that it took from the ambitious the motives to be factious and breed dissension in order to procure the principal stations; and that the King, sharing the honour of victory and the affections of the soldiery with the General, was not likely to become a military tyrant. He defended Coalitions, Parties, and moderation towards ex-Ministers, was eloquent against the French, but likewise hinted at the danger to public liberty from not watching the Government. On the whole I was much pleased with the lecture, which was well adapted to secure popularity. As to his politics, they are certainly moderate, nor do I know that he has gone an inch beyond pure Whiggism.

CHAP. IV.

1799.

Mackintosh on the British Constitution.

Horne Tooke.

Horne Tooke has never been a favourite of mine, but I never thought so well of his heart as I have done from his behaviour to Wakefield, which was kind and respectful; and when we consider, not how like, but how unlike their characters are, his attentions do him the greatest honour. The day sentence was passed he sent to Wakefield, and, in his jocular way, comforted him by observing that probably a year hence he and Mrs. Wakefield would be congratulating each other on his situation—"For, my dear, it has saved you," Mrs. Wakefield will say; "you see Tooke and the rest of them are half way on their voyage to Botany Bay." Horne Tooke promised too, old as he was, to visit him at Dorchester, though he said he had not thought he should travel seven miles from Wimbledon again. This looks well. You have heard, I dare say, that Tooke's friends have lately raised him an annuity for life of £600. This following Dr. Parr's and Fox's seems to show that all regard for public characters is not at an end. . . . . .

Adieu. In haste,

Yours, &c.,

H. C. R.

George Dyer.

I became acquainted about this time with George Dyer. He was one of the best creatures morally that ever breathed. He was the son of a watchman in Wapping, and was put to a charity school by some pious Dissenting ladies. He afterwards went to Christ's Hospital, and from there was sent to Cambridge. He was a scholar, but to the end of his days (and he lived to be eighty-five) was a bookseller's drudge. He led a life of literary labour in poverty. He made indexes, corrected the press, and occasionally gave lessons in Latin and Greek. When an undergraduate at Cambridge he became a hearer of Robert Robinson, and consequently a Unitarian. This closed the Church against him, and 1799.

CHAP. IV.
—

he never had a Fellowship. He became intimate with the Nashes, Fordhams, and Rutt, and was patronized by Wakefield and Mrs. Barbauld. He wrote one good book—"The Life of Robert Robinson," which I have heard Wordsworth mention as one of the best works of biography in the language. Dyer also put his name to several volumes of poetry; but on his poems my friend Reid made an epigram that I fear was thought just:—

> "The world all say, my gentle Dyer,
> Thy odes do very much want fire.
> Repair the fault, my gentle Dyer,
> And throw thy odes into the fire."

Dyer had the kindest heart and simplest manners imaginable. It was literally the case with him that he would give away his last guinea. He was not sensible of any impropriety in wearing a dirty shirt or a ragged coat; and numerous are the tales told in illustration of his neglect of little every-day matters of comfort. He has asked a friend to breakfast with him, and given him coarse black tea, stale bread, salt butter, sour milk, and has had to run out to buy sugar. Yet every one loved Dyer. One day Mrs. Barbauld said to me, "Have you heard whom Lord Stanhope has made executor?"—"No! Your brother?"—"No, there would have been nothing in that. The very worst imaginable."—"Oh, then it is Buonaparte."—"No, guess again."—"George Dyer?"—"You are right. Lord Stanhope was clearly insane!" Dyer was one of six executors. Charles James Fox was another. The executors were also residuary legatees. Dyer was one of the first to declare that he rejected the legacy and renounced the executorship.

But the heir insisted on granting him a small annuity; his friends having before settled another on him, he was comparatively wealthy in his old age. Not many years before his death, he married his laundress, by the advice of his friends—a very worthy woman. He said to me once, "Mrs. Dyer is a woman of excellent natural sense, but she is not literate." That is, she could neither read nor write. Dyer was blind for a few years before his death. I used occasionally to go on a Sunday morning to read to him. At other times a poor man used to render him that service for sixpence an hour. After he came to London, Dyer lived always in some very humble chambers in Clifford's Inn, Fleet Street.

William Hazlitt.

Another interesting acquaintance I made at this period was with William Hazlitt—a man who has left a deservedly high reputation as a critic; but at the time I first knew him he was struggling against a great difficulty of expression, which rendered him by no means a general favourite in society. His bashfulness, want of words, slovenliness of dress, &c., made him sometimes the object of ridicule. It will be better, perhaps, if I confine myself at present to describing him as he was at this early period of our acquaintance. He was the younger brother of John Hazlitt, the miniature painter. His first design was to be a Dissenting minister; and for that purpose he went to the Unitarian New College, Hackney. He afterwards thought of becoming a painter, and lived with his brother. At our first interview I saw he was an extraordinary man. He had few friends, and was flattered by my attentions. We were about the same age, and I was able to render him a service by introducing him to Anthony Robinson, who induced Johnson to publish Hazlitt's first work, "The Eloquence of the British Senate." Late in life, when our intimacy had been broken off, he said to Mary Lamb, "Robinson cuts me, but I shall never cease to have a regard for him, for he was the first person who ever found out that there was anything in me." I was alone in this opinion at the time of which I am speaking. I recollect saying to my sister-in-law, "Whom do you suppose I hold to be the cleverest person I know?"—"Capel Lofft, perhaps?"—"No."—"Mrs. Clarkson?"—"Oh! no."—"Miss Maling?"—"No."—"I give it up."—"William Hazlitt."—"Oh, you are joking. Why, we all take him to be just the reverse." At this time he was excessively shy, especially in the company of young ladies, who on their part were very apt to make fun of him. The prettiest girl of our parties about this time was a Miss Kitchener, and she used to drive him mad by teasing him.

CHAP. IV.

1799.

I was under great obligations to Hazlitt as the director of my taste. It was he who first made me acquainted with the Lyrical Ballads and the poems generally of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, and Southey.

Dr. Geddes.

Among those to whom Mary Hays introduced me was the free-thinking, ultra-liberal Roman Catholic priest, Dr. Geddes, translator of the Old Testament,—a man of fine person and very amiable manners. His wit was exhibited in macaronic verses. He was a patron of two young ladies, the Miss Plumptres. Anne Plumptres made herself known as one of the first introducers of German plays—she translated many of Kotzebue's.

During this summer my friend Miss Maling was in London, living in the same house with the Archbishop of Aix—a man known to history; he pronounced the oration at the coronation of Louis XVI., and afterwards by the favour of Napoleon obtained a cardinal's hat.* He was a zealous emigrant at this time. Having conceived a great respect for Miss Maling, he had destined for her the post of Lectrice to the Duchess of Orleans, had the Revolution succeeded, which was projected this year. He was a man of letters and a poet. I had the honour of an introduction to him, but a mere introduction. I had only time to admire his majestic figure. His preaching I thought magnificent.

I made in this year a pedestrian tour in Wales. On my way I visited Stonehenge—the first place I ever went to see as an object of curiosity; and I had all the enjoyment that was to be derived from so novel and so sublime a scene. This tour, of which I shall write little, afforded me the opportunity of visiting two men, who suffered for political opinions—Gilbert Wakefield and John Thelwall; the former was in prison at Dorchester. A subscription of £3,000 had been raised by his friends, who were thereby enabled to supply Mrs. Wakefield with a very comfortable house in the vicinity of the prison. Here she and the children dwelt, and a spare room was always ready for some friendly visitor. During Wakefield's imprisonment this room was almost always in use. I occupied it several days, and found him suffering more in his spirits than was expected. The distress he witnessed in gaol, and the presence of physical and moral evil, preyed on his mind and seemed to crush him.*

Gilbert Wakefield in prison.

* On the copy of a letter by the Archbishop, Mr. Robinson has written: "Afterwards Cardinal Boisgelin, an emigrant nobleman who made his peace with Buonaparte, and had his due reward in a cardinal's hat for preaching a sermon on the Emperor's marriage."

CHAP. IV. — 1799.

John Thelwall.

John Thelwall, to whom I have already alluded, as having had a narrow escape of conviction for high treason, had settled down in a farm in a beautiful place near Brecon. His history is known to all who care to inform themselves of the personal occurrences of this eventful period. He had left his shop (that of a silk mercer) to be one of the Reformers of the age. After his acquittal he went about the country lecturing, and was exposed to great varieties of fortune. Sometimes he was attended by numerous admirers, but more frequently hooted and pelted by the mob. In order to escape prosecution for sedition he took as his subject Greek and Roman History, and had ingenuity enough to give such a colouring to events and characters as to render the application to living persons and present events an exciting mental exercise. I had heard one or two of these lectures, and thought very differently of him then from what I thought afterwards. When, however, he found his popularity on the wane, and more stringent laws had been passed, to which he individually gave occasion, he came to the prudent resolution of abandoning his vagrant habits and leading a domestic life in the country. It was at this period that my visit was paid, and I received a most cordial welcome. His wife was a very pleasing woman, a great admirer of her husband—never a reproach to a wife, though the kind of husband she has chosen may sometimes be so. But Thelwall was an amiable man in private life; an affectionate husband, and a fond father. He altogether mistook his talents—he told me without reserve that he believed he should establish his name among the epic poets of England; and it is a curious thing, considering his own views, that he thought the establishment of Christianity and the British Constitution very appropriate subjects for his poem.

* He was released from prison May 30, 1801, and died on the 9th of September in the same year.

After a stay of a week, I left my friends with a strong sense of their personal kindness. I may add here that when farming had succeeded as ill as political agitation, he took to the teaching of oratory as a profession, and for a time succeeded in it. For some years he had an establishment in Upper Bedford Place, where he received boarders. But gradually his didactic talents were directed more especially to the correction of defects arising from the malformation of the organs of speech.

Robert Hall.

At Haverfordwest an unexpected pleasure awaited me. I fell in with Robert Hall. He received me with apparent pleasure, and was kind without being flattering. His countenance indicated a powerful intellect and strong sensibility. In disputation he expressed himself with his characteristic point, and sometimes with virulence. He spoke of my sister-in-law with unusual seriousness, and said she was the most extraordinary instance he had ever known of a woman of superior talents preserving universal respect; abilities being so rare among women, and when found so rarely accompanied by amiable qualities. The only allusion he made to our correspondence was by saying of one who thought himself ill treated, "He ought at once to have come forward, and in a manly way, as you did, have made his complaint."

CHAP. IV. — 1799.

The Father and mother of the Hazlitts.

In passing though Wem in Shropshire I saw a very worthy old Presbyterian minister—not worse than an Arian I presume—the father of the Hazlitts. William, who had become my friend, was not there, but John, the miniature painter, was.* I liked the good old man and his wife, who had all the solidity (I do not mean stolidity) and sober earnestness of the more respectable Noncons. There was also a maiden sister. Altogether an amusing and agreeable group in my memory.

H. C. R's. mother's grave.

On my return from Wales I took Bath in my way. Seven years had elapsed since I attended my mother in her last illness, and my desire to see the place of her interment was increased by something Mrs. Fenner had related to me. My mother had expressed pain at being buried at so great a distance from her children. She feared they would never see her grave. "But," she added, "I have no doubt Henry will come though he walk." I did not need this stimulus, for my mother was the sole object of my fondness as a child. It was a substantial gratification to me to find my mother's grave in one of the most beautifully situated church-yards I ever saw—a long slip of land near Whitcomb Church. I have often visited it since, and always with a sort of pleasure.†

* An interesting, but weakly painted portrait of Joseph Lancaster by John Hazlitt is in the National Portrait Gallery. It is in oil, the size of life, and evidently the production of an artist accustomed to work on a smaller scale with different materials.—G. S.

† This part of the Reminiscences was written in 1845 and 1846.

CHAPTER V.

GERMANY. 1800 AND 1801.

I AM now come to an incident, which had a great influence on my tastes and feelings, and therefore, I have no doubt, on my character. In the course of this year I went to Germany, where I remained more than five years, and pursued something like study, and where I was brought into contact with some of the most distinguished men of the age.

Heligoland.

Mr. Aldebert, a German merchant with whom I had become acquainted, undertook to convoy me as far as Frankfort. The journey, which now may be accomplished easily and in a very short time, was comparatively formidable at the beginning of this century. We embarked at Yarmouth, on the 3rd of April, and on Friday evening I beheld that dismal fortress Heligoland, a scene which in my imagination might be appropriately connected with Goethe's "Natürliche Tochter." On the morning of the 6th we landed at Cuxhaven, and proceeded by land to Hamburg. I have still a clear recollection of the flat, cold, colourless country, which an instinctive feeling had led the inhabitants to make as lively as possible by the bright green on the scattered houses.

H. C. R. TO HIS BROTHER T. R.

Hamburg.

We remained twelve days at the Kaiserhof, where we paid 7*s.* a day for a dirty room on a second floor, 4*s.* to the man who waited on us at the hotel and attended us in the town, and 1*s.* 4*d.* for breakfast; in short, where, though we lived in the plainest and most economical style, our daily bill was nearly a guinea apiece. We then removed to private lodgings, where the civility and honesty of the good family reminded us of the family of Lot.

CHAP. V.
1800.

* * * * * * *

Hamburg.

The houses at Hamburg perpetually suggest the idea that you are looking at England as it was a century ago. The original model of a farm-house (and farm-houses were the primitive houses) as I have seen it in the wild parts of Hanover, is that of one immense room, without chimney or division—the various parts being allotted, as a farmer lays out his different seeds or fruits. At one corner the fire—here the beds—there the piggery—there some furniture—and a good carriage-way all through. Now the progress of refinement is this: after a time the sides are separated (like the King's Bench and Common Pleas in Westminster Hall), glazed, and adorned, for the women and children—but still the centre is unpaved. I have seen several respectable houses of this kind in the country near Hamburg. Refinement increases, but still the old hall remains as in ancient English mansions. Perhaps we have gone beyond the exact mark of propriety through our proud love of retirement, and by converting our halls into narrow passages and large parlours, have injured our houses as summer retreats and promoted the natural shyness of our tempers. In the houses near Hamburg the genteelest families dine or drink coffee in their halls, and with the doors open to observation and curiosity. In the town, too, most of the houses have the narrow or gable end in front, which necessarily precludes the elegant uniformity of a Bath street, but at the same time allows of an infinite variety of ornament, which gives an idea of distinctiveness, and is, I think, an advantage. As the stories rise, the curtain, if it may be so called, is narrowed till it terminates in a pyramid. There is, it must be confessed, a great waste of room in the lofty halls and shops which you see in the front of the Hamburg houses. But perhaps it is more pleasing to witness resources and means of future improvements, as necessities may arise, than to behold, as in London, every inch occupied, and management and economy put to their last shifts. The dress of the lower classes confirms the suggestion that Germany is now what England was. Many a poor woman wears a tight black velvet bonnet like that in which Mary Queen of Scots is painted. The Lutheran clergy appear to wear the cast-off ruffs of Queen Elizabeth.

Frankfort.

After remaining a few weeks at Hamburg, we proceeded to Frankfort, where Mr. Aldebert procured me lodgings near his own house, and introduced me to his relations and partners. I set about reading as hard as I could, dining at the various hotels in the city, which were famed for their excellence. My first object was to acquire a knowledge of the German language, and I took lessons of an old man named Peile, who confided to me that he had been when young a member of the

CHAP. V. 1800.

Illuminati, an order of which he gave me a better opinion than I previously had, both in regard to their intentions and their practical ability.

Frankfort was then a fortified town, much to its disadvantage in regard to air and comfort, and without any adequate compensation, for the fortification was next to useless. Now, in the place of the walls and ditches, there are beautiful walks which render the place as agreeable as it was formerly dismal. Though professedly neutral, its neutrality was violated on the 6th of July.

H. C. R. TO T. R.

The French.

I believe were a cracker or squib to be let off in any town in Great Britain, and were it thought to come from a French hand, half the old women would be in fits. Now, I had so much of the old woman in me that one day when I was sleeping over my German grammar, and the maid burst into the room, crying "The French are at the gates," I made but two skips down stairs, and flew into the principal street. It was a false alarm, but I found all in confusion—a body of Mayençois troops had demanded entrance, and were then on their march to support their allies, whom the French were attacking a few miles off. They had cannon, with lighted matches. The men were fine fellows, and without being sad were grave. I knew they were going into the field, and I felt that sinking within the breast which betrays the coward—but they passed away and my sinking too. The rest of the day nothing was known. On the morrow we learnt that the French had been thrice beaten back, but that early in the morning they had renewed the attack, and were now in the midst of the engagement. I left my books, and hastened to the ramparts, which were covered with idlers. Couriers passed backwards and forwards, but nobody knew what was going forward. Citizens are mob, and soldiers are gentlemen at such times; and Sterne's remark concerning Susanna and the women at a groaning might be parodied here. Our curiosity was not left, however, to starve for want of nourishment; every now and then a waggon slowly entered the town, and though covered with straw or cloth, we generally could perceive something moving underneath—it was only a wounded man—nothing more! By and by I ventured, with the doctor of the house, to make an excursion. We walked up a hill, and were near enough to hear the discharge of musketry, and see the smoke and flash of the cannons, but that was all. And I was half angry with myself for being so composed. It was probable that every instant some horrid wound was inflicted, or some wretch suddenly carried off, and yet I ate cherries! And how could it be otherwise? We are sympathetic; and indifference, or the want of passion, is catching as well as passion itself. The persons around me were at their ease, and that made me so in a great degree. I cannot forbear to make a remark, which though simple is important. From the modern system of war and politics, by which the civil and the military state are so much separated, and the subject is so much distinguished from the prince, this consequence has arisen—that war has ceased to be a matter of national passion, and has become in a great degree a professional business. At least in this neighbourhood it is so.

CHAP. V. — 1800.

Next day in the evening the French actually came, and I, standing on the walls, witnessed their entrance. The general indifference at the event confounded me; but it was in reality an affair of money. They came not as an enemy. The soldiers were billeted in the town; and a gentlemanly young officer was in the house in which I lodged. With him I soon became acquainted. He loved poetry, and we talked on various subjects. Nor did he take any exception to my being an Englishman. At this moment the war was flagging.

Sophia de la Roche.

Of those to whom I was introduced, there is one of whom it is necessary that I should write a few words. This was Sophia de la Roche, a sentimental novelist, and in her youth a friend of Wieland, under whose auspices she became known as an authoress. Her daughter married Brentano, a wealthy merchant, who died young; and among her grandchildren were several with whom I had much to do during my residence in Germany. She herself was never tired of talking of England, of which she was a passionate admirer. An amusing account of her is given in Madame d'Arblay's Memoirs.* In extravagant language she poured out to me her love of this country, declaring that on her death-bed she should thank God for her journey hither, and expressing the wish that she could offer up her soul to God in Richmond vale!

My journal mentions a circumstance worth recording

* Diary and Letters of Madame d'Arblay. Sept. 1786. Vol. III. p. 136.

CHAP. V. — 1800. Hamlet.

in connection with the drama in the wealthy city of Frankfort. I saw the play of "Hamlet" performed by actors of repute; but the catastrophe was changed. As Hamlet is about to drink the poison the Queen's illness is perceived—his hand is stayed—he rushes on the King and slays him—he is attacked—thunder is heard—the Queen confesses—he forgives Laertes—and all's well that ends well. This I have told to Germans, who have wished to deny the fact.

In July I wrote to my brother—"My last letter told you that I had ceased to be a traveller. The effect produced on the mind by the knowledge that you are but the inhabitant of a day is really astonishing. It quickens the observation and animates the spirits exceedingly. While I was on my journey nothing escaped me. It was a second childhood. I was once more gay, impetuous, inquisitive, and adventurous; but as soon as I had fixed myself I became the same dull, phlegmatic, and sometimes hyppish soul, which I was often in my lodgings in London. I am now so domesticated, so reconciled to the slight varieties of manners, that nothing but the language reminds me I am out of Old England."

In September I give this account of my life at Frankfort:—

"I breakfast at half-past seven, and dine at twelve—then I go to a reading society, where I meet with a profusion of German magazines (which are something between the English magazines and periodical essayists), the Moniteur and French journals, and the English Chronicle. This is an agreeable addition to what my sister properly calls 'my comforts,' and is my after-dinner dessert. Three times a week I go to a respectable old gentleman who corrects my translations into German, and from him I try to get an idea of German literature. It is, however, too soon to talk about it. I take solitary walks about the town, which are pleasant, and generally on the Sunday accompany some friends to one of the neighbouring villages, where we drink coffee or wine. This is the universal custom, and I do not dislike it. These little parties are not expensive. The company is very mixed, and there is often music and dancing—but the dancing is unlike anything you ever saw. You must have heard of it under the name of waltzing—that is, rolling or turning, though the rolling is not horizontal but perpendicular. Yet Werter, after describing his first waltz with Charlotte, says—and I say so too—'I felt that if I were married, my wife should waltz (or roll) with no one but myself.' Judge—the man places the palms of his hands gently against the sides of his partner, not far from the arm-pits. His partner does the same, and instantly with as much velocity as possible they turn round and at the same time gradually glide round the room. Now, as Sir Isaac Newton borrowed his notion of attraction from an apple falling, why might not Copernicus, who was a German,* conceive his theory of the twofold motion of the earth from a waltz, where both parties with great rapidity themselves turn round and yet make the circuit of the room?"

CHAP. V.
—
1800.

Frankfort life.

Waltzing.

* Copernicus was a Pole.

It was my habit to make occasional excursions when I found a suitable companion. On one of these occasions, when Mrs. Aldebert was following her husband to England, I accompanied her to the gates of Castel, a suburb of Mainz, and was left without a passport.

At the inn at Hochheim I found three French officers. I was startled, but as there was an armistice (it was the 16th of August) I thought frankness the safest policy. I joined them at the dinner-table. "A hot day, sir."—"Yes, sir." (N.B. The French, like the Quakers, do not like to be called "Citizen" but by a citizen, though, unlike the brethren, they preserve the old forms of civility, and use "Sir" as much as formerly to strangers.) I immediately told of my ride from Frankfort, of my friends who were at Mainz, and of my incapacity to follow them. "It is mortifying," said I, "to see a fine town and rich country shut against one."—"Yes, to be sure; but it is not difficult to get a pass. You are a German?"—"No."—"Pray what countryman are you, then?"—"Can I answer with safety? If, now, I should be an unlucky enemy by birth, are you bound officially to arrest me?"—"Oh, no!" said they, and laughed; and I found that the Englishman was very welcome. So I stayed several hours with them, and debated on politics. I found in these and several other officers more respect than I should have expected for Mr. Pitt, who individually is fancied to be all in all in the Cabinet; they had a warm zeal for France as France, without much care about its immediate government.

The French.

This spirit of patriotism unquestionably saved the nation. Could Mr. Burke have persuaded the people of France that "France was out of itself," the affair would have been over. And the Revolution owed its success to the early creation of a power which the people looked up to as its head. The first Assembly, by calling itself the National, gained the nation by the word.

In the progress of familiarity I begged the officers to tell me how I stood as to personal safety. They said unquestionably liable to be arrested every moment, but not in any great danger; there were parties on the scout to pick up deserters and examine travellers. Being on foot I should likely enough be considered a native, but if questioned, as I had no passport, I should certainly be taken before the Commandant at Mainz, and they did not advise my going farther.

I did not however take alarm, and went on to the little town of Biebrich, the residence of the Prince of Nassau. Here I was very civilly treated at the only inn in the place. Next day I made a circuitous walk back, taking in my way Wiesbaden, a small neat dull curious old German town, famous only for its hot spring. It is noteworthy that this has become one of the most fashionable watering-places in Germany, much frequented by English guests, with elegant gambling-houses which have been a source of great wealth to the Prince.

Wiesbaden.

The following letters will give some idea of the condition of England at the close of the eighteenth century:—

T. R. to H. C. R.

Bury, Dec. 18th, 1800.

I cannot forbear speaking a word or two on the situation of our own country. You cannot be aware, I think, to the extent in which it exists, of the distress of all orders of people amongst us on account of the high price of provisions. The poor-rates have risen to an unexampled height—they have nearly doubled since you left England. The present rate at Bury for the quarter is seven shillings in the pound, upon an assessment of two-thirds of the rental—in short, as much is paid to the poor as to the landlord. At the commencement of the war the rate with us was not more than 1*s.* 9*d.* or 2*s.* in the pound. The burden which the circumstances have laid upon the people will, I imagine, be scarcely credited in Germany, and yet the situation of Bury is much less lamentable than that of many other towns in the kingdom. The alarm respecting a scarcity is so great that Parliament is now assembled by special proclamation to take into consideration the best means of relieving the nation in the present dearth. High bounties are accordingly offered to encourage the importation of grain, and various plans of economy are recommended to diminish the consumption of bread. The causes of the distressed state of the country are a subject of controversy both within and out of Parliament. The Administration are, of course, very strenuous in maintaining that the war has no share in it, while the Opposition as loudly attempt to prove it is the principal cause. The seasons have unquestionably been very unfavourable. But besides these palpable reasons an idea Distress in England.

Chap. v.
—
1800.

has been set afloat, and very eagerly caught at by vast numbers of people, that the scarcity is to be chiefly attributed to monopoly. As a disciple of Adam Smith, you will probably recollect his sentiments on the subject. He compares the dread of monopoly, when a free trade is allowed in so bulky a commodity as corn, to the terror of witchcraft. This opinion, it is understood, has been adopted by our leading statesmen, both on the Ministerial and Opposition side. And so much has this opinion prevailed till of late, that I understand the old statute laws relating to forestalling, regrating, &c., were some few years since repealed. The common law, however, still remaining in force, a prosecution grounded upon it was a few months since commenced against Waddington, a great hop merchant, for monopoly, and another against a contractor for regrating. On one of their trials Lord Kenyon combated the doctrine of Adam Smith; and on the defendant being convicted, warmly applauded the jury for their verdict, and said the country was much indebted to them. He was followed in this opinion by the greater part of the judges, who, on the ensuing circuit, declaimed against those hard-hearted persons who made a prey of their fellow-creatures by withholding from them the necessaries of life, and strongly urged the magistrates to be vigilant to prevent the markets being forestalled. In consequence of this recommendation associations were formed in almost every county to carry it into effect.

Owing to these proceedings a violent clamour was excited against corn-dealers and farmers, which being joined in by the mob, artificial scarcity became the cry.

Farmers were threatened, and their barns and ricks in many places were set on fire; this has been particularly the case in the neighbourhood of Bocking, where several wilful conflagrations have taken place. . . . . .

Jan. 27th, 1801.

. . . . The times continue excessively hard with us—indeed the cloud of evil seems to threaten more and more every day. Corn rises every market-day, and indeed alarm is spreading in all directions, and not least among the friends of the administration. I wish not to dwell upon political topics, but distress has brought them home to everybody's bosom, and they now produce all the interest of domestic incidents. With the Funds falling, and trade very precarious, Mary and I sometimes talk of emigration—but where to go is the question. France is the only country which to my mind presents any temptation. The language, however, is an insuperable objection. Buonaparte seems as if he would make the assumed title of great nation a valid claim, and I fear it is as clear that the sun of England's glory is set. Indeed I am become quite an alarmist, which I believe is equally the case with the democrat and the aristocrat. Such is the state of the country in the prime article of life—flour, that the millers are prohibited under very heavy penalties from making any but coarse flour, and instead of any restraint being laid upon them against mixing of grains, encouragement is given them to do it. Speaking on the state of the country the other day to Garnham he exclaimed, "A very pretty state we are reduced to—our pockets filled with paper and our bellies filled with chicken's meat!"

Chap. v. — 1801.

Mar. 9th, 1801.

. . . . If you have noticed in the papers you are no doubt interested in the circumstances of Horne Tooke having obtained a seat in the House of Commons as representative of the famous borough of Old Sarum. This he effected through the patronage of the eccentric Lord Camelford. A very interesting debate is expected to-morrow on a motion of Lord Temple to inquire into the eligibility of a priest to a seat in Parliament. Lord Camelford, it is said, told Lord Grenville that if the black coat were rejected he would send a black man, referring to a negro servant of his, born in England, whom he would qualify to take a seat.

Horne Tooke.

. . . . When we were in London Mary and I had lodgings in Newgate Street. The theatre was the only amusement which interested me. We were, of course, desirous of seeing the present nine days' wonder, Mr. Cooke. We were so lucky as to see him in Richard, his favourite character. Nature has assisted him greatly in the performance of this part—his features being strongly marked and his voice harsh. I felt at the time that he personated the ferocious tyrant better than Kemble could have done. There is besides a sort of humour in his manner of acting which appeared very appropriate, and which I think Kemble could not have given; and I think it likely the latter would be surpassed in Shylock. Cooke's powers of expression are strong and coarse. I am persuaded that in dignified and refined character—in the philosophical hero—he would fall infinitely short of Kemble. He had the effrontery to play the Stranger, but, if I mistake not, he appeared in it but once. . . . . . .

Cooke the Actor.

Baron Hohenfels.

Early in 1801 I became acquainted with a very interesting and remarkable person—Baron Hohenfels, the Dom-dechant von Speyer. He had a somewhat quixotic figure—tall and gaunt, with marked features. Though careless about his dress he had a distinguished gait. He was an elderly man who had been for many years chancellor of the Elector of Treves, and as such, had he continued in office, would have been the Elector's successor. He was also, as he used to tell me, a bishop in partibus. But he was a very liberal and philosophic churchman, and preferred a life of literary leisure. He had been in England, to which he was warmly attached, and had a strong liking for Austria. Everything French and Prussian he hated in an equal degree. To the Austrian State and the Romish Church he was attached politically. He was living an idle life, and in order therefore to gratify as well his indolence as his taste for everything English—he loved our poets not less than our politicians—he was glad to have even my acquaintance. We frequently walked together, and he taught me much by the questions he was in the habit of putting to me. On one occasion he was very particular in inquiring what the Unitarians believed. What did Priestley believe? On my mentioning some orthodox doctrines rejected, he asked "Did Priestley believe the resurrection?"—"Yes." On this, with a very significant expression, he said, "This reminds me of an anecdote of Ninon de l'Enclos. Being asked one day by a Parisian lady, whether she believed that St. Denys walked all the way to Paris with his head under his arm, 'Pourquoi pas, Mademoiselle?' Ninon said; 'ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte.'"

Chap. v. 1801.

The Baron was more fond of asking than of answering questions; but when I pressed him, he did not shrink from a reply, which, without compromising himself, seemed to me intelligible. I had before drawn from him the remark that Christianity is a great fact —that the fact being admitted it allowed neither of criticism nor of argument; and now in reference to the claims of Roman Catholicism I asked whether the evidence of the later miracles was as strong as that of the earlier. His answer was again in the form of an anecdote: "In the time of Pope —— there were some saints who were called the new saints. On one occasion his Holiness exclaimed, 'These new saints make me doubt the old.' You will excuse my not giving a more direct reply." I ought to add that some years afterwards, when the Baron died, he left all his property to the Roman Catholic church at Frankfort.

Charlotte and Paulina Serviere.

I had not known this interesting man many days before he said he would introduce me to two young ladies "qui petillaient d'esprit." These were Charlotte and Paulina Serviere. They were persons of small fortune and carried on a little business, but lived on terms of intimacy with one of the most distinguished families in Frankfort—that of Brentano. Charlotte Serviere was not handsome, but was attractive to me by singular good sense and sweetness of disposition, though the latter quality was generally assigned in a higher degree to the younger sister, Paulina, who was a joyous, kind creature, naïve, sportive, voluble—liked by every one. In their house I became intimate, and there I soon saw the ladies of the Brentano family—to whom I was introduced on the very same day by Mad. de la Roche. By them also I was received as a friend. Mad. Brentano, a beautiful Viennese, the eldest daughter Kunigunda—afterwards the wife of Savigny, the great Prussian lawyer and statesman—were my present companions. They proposed that I should read English to them, and that they should initiate me into German poetry, in other words into Goethe, with whom they were personally acquainted, and of whom they were all devoted worshippers. During the first four months of 1801 I made considerable progress in the study of Goethe, and imbibed a taste for German poetry and literature, which I have always retained.

The Brentanos.

H. C. R. TO T. R.

Goethe is the idol of the German literary public. The critics of the new school assert that since the existence of letters there have been only four of those called geniuses, on whom Nature and Art seem to have showered down all their gifts to form that perfection of intellect—a Poet. Virgil, Milton, Wieland, Klopstock, Ariosto, Ossian, Tasso, &c. &c., are singers of various and great excellence, but the sacred poetic fire has been possessed in its perfection only by Homer, Cervantes, Shakespeare, and Goethe. Nay, some of this new school have even asserted that the three great "tendencies" of the late century are the French Revolution, the Fichtian Philosophy and "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre."

Clemens Brentano.

This valuable addition to my acquaintance had been made only a few days, when it was increased by that of the brother, Clemens Brentano,—then known only by irregular ballads and songs inserted in a very irregular novel, but a poet in character, as that term is generally understood, and a man of genius, though not an artist; and after many years the author of fairy tales which brought him éclat. He was on terms of intimacy with the Schlegels, Tieck, and others of the romantic school; but on account of peculiarities of temperament was rather difficult to get on with. As I shall have little to say of him hereafter, I may add that he married a poetess named Sophie Mereau, who however died after a short time. Late in life he took a religious turn, and published a strange book, professedly relating from the lips of a diseased nun her visions of the sufferings of Christ; but the Bishop of Ratisbon, Seiler, would not allow the work to be printed without being accompanied by the declaration that the visions were given as the pious contemplations of a good woman, and not as preternatural revelations.

Personally I had more to do with a younger brother, whose education was unfinished, and who, learning that Christian Brentano.

I was unsettled, proposed that I should accompany him on foot into Saxony, where I could go on with my study, while he completed his. In my entirely isolated state an offer much less agreeable than this would have been acceptable. I should visit a country which I longed to see. Several months however elapsed before our plan was carried into effect. In the meanwhile I pursued my studies with something like system; devoting myself steadily to German poetry and philosophy. All my vacant time was spent either with the Servieres or the Brentanos. The manners of this little society were very free and easy; and my character as an Englishman contributed to my being treated as a pet.

Wetzlar.

Before my departure I made a short journey with Herr Mylius and his sister Mad. Kohl to Wetzlar, —a town of some importance because, under the old German constitution, it was the seat of a court of appeal from courts held in all the small states of Germany; in other respects an insignificant place. The noblesse of this old-fashioned "free city" were the big-wigs, the lawyers. Our journey lay through a pleasing country, and this three-days excursion made me acquainted with the simple manners of a people who seemed to belong to a former age. The tribunal has been abolished, and the town no doubt lost its privileges as a free city.

Göttingen.

My tour with Christian Brentano began on the 14th of June. Our first object was to see his brother Clemens, who was then residing at Göttingen. I will not stop to give particulars of any of the places through which we passed. On our arrival I was received with kindness, and introduced to Clemens Brentano's friends. Of these the principal was a young man of great promise—a poet and scholar. He lectured on poetry, and strengthened the interest I already felt in German philosophy and literature. His name was Winckelmann. He died a few years later, still a young man. It was he who first distinctly taught me that the new German philosophy—in connection with which Fichte was the most celebrated living teacher, and Schelling was rising into fame—was idealism. Winckelmann urged me to study Fichte's "Wissenschaftslehre,"—which he said was in its elements the philosophy of Plato, Spinoza, and Berkeley.

CHAP. V. — 1801.

Winckelmann.

These two days, like the preceding weeks, served as a hot-bed to me. In my letter to my brother, I noticed what then was a novelty to me: "I must not forget a curious trait of the new school. They are all poetico-metaphysical religionists. Clemens Brentano declared religion to be 'philosophy taught through mystery.' And the heading of one of Winckelmann's lectures on poetry was, 'the Virgin Mary as the ideal of female beauty and perfection.'"

Harz Mountains.

Christian Brentano and myself next proceeded to visit the celebrated mine-mountains of the Harz, belonging to Hanover; and some of our Göttingen friends accompanied us a day on the road. We stayed successively at Osterode and St. Andreasberg. At this place I gratified my curiosity by descending a mine, learning thereby that it is a fatiguing and particularly uninstructive and uninteresting spectacle. Generally speaking I know no sight which so ill repays the labour. Two things have fixed themselves on my mind: first, a number of men in narrow slanting passages knocking off bits of soil mixed with metal, and, secondly, the motion of boxes up and down perpetually. I could hardly be angry with the vulgar inscription of an English "my lord" in the album: "Descended this d——d old hole."

Ascent of the Brocken.

We spent a night on the Brocken or Blocksberg, and I ought not to forget when mentioning this famous mountain that it has been from time immemorial the seat of witchcraft; the witches of the Blocksberg till the present age being the most illustrious in Germany. The historians assign a reasonable cause. The region of the Harz was the very last converted to Christianity, and the heathen religious rites were for the last time performed on the Blocksberg. When the country was at last subdued, troops were stationed in the principal avenues up the mountain to prevent the natives exercising unlawful and ungodly ceremonies. Some of the more zealous, however, disguised themselves in various frightful forms, came at midnight, and frightened away the superstitious soldiery. Since that time the Brocken has been in ballads and old stories the seat of "monsters, hydras, and chimæras dire."

Saxony.

Passing over other local matters which afforded me much pleasure, I proceed to that part of my Diary in which I say: We had this day entered the Saxony which Goethe in his "Wilhelm Meister" so significantly

CHAP. V. — 1801.

terms den gebildeten aber auch bildlosen Theil von Deutschland. We lose the play of words when we render this "the cultivated but imageless part of Germany."*

While I was staying at Frankfort I seldom ventured to speak German when I was with those who spoke either English or French; but during this journey I made as it were a spring, and found that I was very well able to make myself understood in the language of the country.

Grimma.

The place at which Christian Brentano was studying, and at which I was for a time to reside, was Grimma, a small town not very far from Leipzig and on the Mulde—a very agreeable residence for a student. It had a large Gymnasium or Prince's school, one of the feeders of the Leipzig University. The mathematical teacher at this school was one Töpfer, who received Brentano into his house. The family lived in a very plain way, and I was kindly received by them.

The chief person in the town was a Mr. Riese, a large manufacturer. I had seen him at Frankfort. He was very attentive to me, and offered me the use of his house; but I thought lodgings would for the present be preferable. My prospect was a satisfactory one. I had access to Mr. Riese's very respectable library; such society as the town afforded was open to me, and I should have Brentano as a frequent companion in my walks.*

* Goethe's meaning is not easily understood without the context. The whole sentence is: "Er kam in den gebildeten, aber auch bildlosen Theil von Deutschland, wo es zur Verehrung des Guten und Schönen zwar nicht an Wahrheit, aber oft an Geist gebricht." Carlyle has translated this as follows: "He came into the polished but also barren part of Germany, where, in worshipping the good and the beautiful there is indeed no want of truth, but frequently a grievous want of spirit." Bildlos is not much used in modern literature, in fact Grimm knows only this instance from Goethe besides those which he gives from writers of the 16th and 17th centuries. The meaning according to him is imagine carens. Gebildet corresponds with Wahrheit, and bildlos with want of Geist. If so, Goethe meant to say that the Saxons were indeed apt to acquire knowledge from others, but were wanting in original productiveness.

Of the two months passed at Grimma at this time, and of the short period I spent there later in the year, when I took up my quarters at the house of Mr. Riese, I will say no more than that I was very happy, and began to read Kant, at the recommendation of Töpfer who was a zealous Kantianer. I looked also into the writings of Jacobi.

Moravian Establishment.

In a short tour which I made by myself in order to test my power of finding interest in solitary travel, I availed myself of the opportunity which offered itself of visiting a Moravian establishment at Ebersdorf; and I had a great deal of pleasure—the pleasure of sympathizing with a very benevolent and truly Christian society. The day on which I was there was Sunday, and I heard three sermons in one day with less than usual ennui, and was introduced to the well-bred, accomplished presidentess, Fräulein Gerstendorf. Without attempting to give a detailed account of the constitution of these Moravian institutions, I may describe

* Our tour seems to be insignificant on the map, but, with all our deviations, was not less than sixty German miles, at least 300 English miles. Our expenses together nine guineas; deducting therefore what I should have paid at Frankfort, my journey has cost me only two and a half guineas. And when it is considered that we included in our tour one of the most fashionable and famous resident towns, and one of the celebrated districts of Germany, it must be allowed that travelling is for me a cheap pleasure. Thanks to my good health and sound limbs, I hope to see a great part of Germany and France at a trifling expense.—H. C. R.'s Journal.

Chap. v.
—
1801.

them as a kind of Protestant monasteries. They are distinguished from those of the Roman Catholics by these two striking features: first, there is no compulsion to stay, either openly enforced by the law, or through a vow or secret understanding binding on the conscience. Any one may leave when he pleases. Secondly, there are no idlers—all are workers. The unmarried live together, and sleep in two huge apartments. Going through these two vast dormitories I was struck by their perfect cleanliness and sweetness. The married live in apartments by themselves. They have private property, and have few or many comforts according to their respective means. The sermons I heard were evangelical, perhaps Calvinistic; but in one respect contrasted very advantageously with our English orthodoxy. Little importance seemed to be attached to doctrine. I heard nothing about belief, but a great deal about love. They had such set phrases as "the love of the Lord," "the faith of the heart." I would add that this is in perfect correspondence with Goethe's confessions of a beautiful soul in "Wilhelm Meister;" and, if the bringing together of things so unlike may be permitted, my own dear mother's written Experience when she was received into the Wattisfield church, in which there is nothing about theological opinions, but much about love, a consciousness of guilt, &c. It occurred to me that this institution seemed to come nearer to an apostolic body than any I had ever seen, and that the Gospel age seems to have had no presentiment of the legal and political establishment of Christianity, but to have contemplated rather a multiplication of brotherhoods resembling these of the Herrnhuter. The founders named their first establishment in Moravia Herrnhut, i.e. the Lord's heed or guard.*

The Moravians.

The churchyard, to which the kind-hearted attendant who showed me about the place took me, was very prettily ornamented with shrubs and flowers, and I was much struck by the unfeigned joy with which he talked of death, as, with a childlike simplicity and almost gaiety, he jumped on the grave in which the remains of his wife had been recently laid. Fräulein Gerstendorf was a woman of ability, exemplifying the compatibility of practical wisdom with a devout spirit.

At Schneeberg I fell in with Anton Wall's "Amatonda," a fairy tale which much delighted me.†

Welshman at Chemnitz.

At Chemnitz I met with a Welshman, whose history interested me. He was by trade a watchmaker, living at Holywell, where he had great difficulty in supporting his wife and three children; but he was a mechanic and understood the steam-engine. Graf —— was then travelling for the Elector of Saxony, and made the man an offer of a fair stipend if he would leave his country. "I know," said he, "that if I were to attempt to go back to England, I should be hanged; but I do not want to go. I am at the head of a manufactory here, and my employer gives me £200 per annum, besides perquisites. My wife and children are here. Besides, the Elector has given me a bond for £100 per annum

* The Colony settled at the foot of the Hutberg, or pasture-hill. The name has a double meaning—Hut signifying "guard" as well as "a place where flocks are guarded."

† This tale was afterwards translated by Mr. Robinson.

CHAP. V. — 1801.

during my life. The only condition is that I remain in the country. I need do nothing; I may spend my time in a public-house if I like; I should still be entitled to my hundred a year." He told me of several persons who were paid for living in the country, with a perfect freedom of action.

Parish clergyman at Colditz.

On the day on which I expected to reach Grimma an agreeable incident detained me at Colditz. It was late in the evening when I fell in with a parish clergyman, who having found that I was what is here called an English Gelehrter, and bound for Grimma, invited me to take a bed at his parsonage. He had a name singularly in contrast with his character—Hildebrand; for he was very liberal in his opinions, and very anti-church in his tastes. We had many hours' talk on subjects equally interesting to him and to me. He gave me an account of the state of religious opinion among the Saxon, i.e. Lutheran, clergy. He professed himself to be a believer in miracles, but evidently had no unfriendly feeling towards the free-thinkers, whom

The Rationalists.

he called Naturalisten, but who are now better known under the name of Rationalists. He declared that their ablest men were Socinians, if not Naturalists. On my saying that Michaelis's "Introduction to the New Testament" had been translated into English, he said, "That work is already forgotten here; we have a more learned commentary in the work of Paulus." On my inquiring whether the clergy had no tests, "Oh, yes," he replied, "we affirm our belief in the symbolical books; but we have a very convenient saving-clause 'as far as they are not contradictory to the word of God.' The fact is, we pay very little attention to the old orthodox doctrines, but dare not preach against them. We say nothing about them." This I believe to be true. I recollect relating to my host the retort which Wilkes is said to have made to a Roman Catholic, who had asked, "Where was your religion before Luther?" The answer was, "Where were your hands before you washed them?" Hildebrand said that that very retort is to be found in one of the pamphlets published in Germany at the time of the Reformation.

Saxon Nobility.

During my tour I met with a young Saxon nobleman, Herr von Carlowitz, a pupil of the Fürsten-Schule, who invited me to accompany him to his mother's house. This plan left me so little time at Grimma that I was barely able to write a few letters and show myself to my friends.

Falkenstein, the seat of young Carlowitz's mother, was only a walk of about four leagues. As we were not expected, we found no one but the servants in the house. In the evening, however, came my lady, with friends, who were staying with her, and I had a specimen of the proverbial stiffness of the Saxon nobility. She was a stately dame, and had but a short time back been beautiful; she was rich, and was addressed with formal respect by all about her. At night on taking leave every one kissed her hand, excepting myself; and I omitted the ceremony through my ignorance, and gave offence. At supper grace was said in verse.

Dresden.

My intention was to proceed to Dresden and Prague,

CHAP. V. — 1801.

and I reached the former place after two more nights on the way. I was delighted with the coup d'œil from the bridge, including noble edifices, and the views up and down the river. There was also a stillness which soothed me. I will copy a remark or two I made at the time respecting the impression made on me by Dresden: "One sees more of elegance and the amusing formality of innocent aristocracy, than of the luxury of upstart wealth. One is neither oppressed by greatness, nor confounded by bustle. Many an Excellency rides in a carriage which in London would be thought a shabby hackney-coach; and the distinctions of rank are announced by formal appendages,—sword, big wig, &c., not costly attire.

Green Vaults.

"The most famous of the sights of Dresden is the Grüne Gewölbe, or Green Vaults, the most illustrious warehouse of jewellery and other toys in the world. Augustus, the lavish and the strong king of Poland, was the founder of this collection, consisting of all sorts of things wrought in ivory and gold, vessels of every form. I saw these in company with a French lady and her husband. Her raptures rose to something like hysterics.

Picture-gallery.

"The picture-gallery was the first of great excellence I had ever seen. It contains the picture, which now that I have seen all that Rome and Florence, Naples, Venice and Paris have to exhibit, I still look back upon as the one which has afforded me the highest delight—the Madonna di San Sisto, or Vierge aux Anges. When I first saw it, I exclaimed unintentionally, 'Looking at this, it is possible to believe the Immaculate Conception.' The Roman Catholic custode who was present looked offended, with no reason. I possess a fine copy of Müller's engraving. There are few pictures for which I would exchange it.*

"One other source of especial pleasure at Dresden was an almost daily visit to the Catholic chapel, for church music (though I am insensible to ordinary music) I can enjoy."

Pillnitz.

I did not omit to make an excursion, occupying a day, to Pillnitz, which has a castle of doubtful or disputed celebrity; it being still a question whether the treaty which bears the name of Pillnitz was ever entered into among the great powers in 1792 to partition France.

Saxon Switzerland.

At the distance of a few miles from Dresden is a knot of little valleys, known by the name of the Saxon Switzerland. This district is about fifteen miles in length and two or three broad, and it affords in miniature every variety of mountain and valley scenery. The first place I came to, the little town of Pirna, detained me by its attractions. I had parted from my young companion, and was left here to myself in a country so beautiful, and in an inn so comfortable, that I stayed four days. One of the largest rocks in this neighbourhood is the insulated

* This copy of Müller's engraving was given by Mr. Robinson's will to E. W. Field.

This picture, unlike all Raphael's other altar-pieces, is painted on canvas, which gave rise to an opinion, strongly contested by Professor Hübner, Keeper of the Gallery at Dresden, that it was originally intended to serve as a Processional Banner. The picture was purchased by Augustus, King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, from the monks of the church of San Sisto, at Piacenza, in 1754, for about £10,000.—G. S.

CHAP. V. — 1801. Königstein.

and famous Königstein. It is said to have been rendered impregnable. Certainly it has never been taken. During the long French possession of Germany, Buonaparte could never obtain possession of this fortress from the otherwise obsequious King of Saxony, who retained it as a place of deposit for his green-vault and other treasures. It is too small to hold a large garrison, and therefore might be spared by Buonaparte. Amidst the recesses of a mountain forest is a vast mass of rocks, some eighty feet in height, with a natural cavity or hollow called the Kuhstall (Cowstall), and which, according to the legendary tales, was a place of refuge for the Saxon peasants from the imperial troops during the Seven Years' War. It might well be so now, for the brushwood and stunted trees would render the passage of troops impossible. This wild and desolate spot I crossed; and when I found myself again in the beautiful valley of the Elbe, I was in Bohemia.

Bohemia.

The difference between a Roman Catholic country and that I had hitherto been in was apparent at once in the salutation of the peasantry. Every one who met me muttered "Gelobt sei Jesus Christus" (Praised be Jesus Christ). To which I invariably answered, "In Ewigkeit" (To eternity). "Amen" was the rejoinder. Then the ordinary talk about weather or inquiry about roads followed. Had I not responded like a good Christian, I should have had no other greeting. The first night I slept at Teschen, in a small house with worthy people, and my first evening in Bohemia is worth recording. I have often told the story. In a large kitchen lay a bedridden old woman near the fire. She began questioning me—"Are you a Christian?"—"Yes."—"A Catholic Christian?" The landlord came up—"Don't trouble the gentleman with questions; you know he is an Englishman, and cannot be such a Christian as we are."—"I know only one sort of Christian," muttered she. "Why, mother! don't you know the priest says it is the duty of everybody to remain of the religion they are born in?" This looked like indifference at least, and I got into talk with him. I asked him about the Hussites—"Oh, they are the most loyal and peaceable of all our people."—"It did not use to be so."—"Oh, no! they were always breeding disturbances, but the Emperor Joseph put an end to that. Their priests were very poor and lived on the peasants; one man gave them a breakfast, another a dinner, another a bed; and so they went from house to house, beggars and paupers. When the Emperor came to Prague to be crowned, among the decrees which he issued the first day was one that the Hussite priests should be allowed the same pay as the lowest order of the Catholic clergy. And since then we have never had a disturbance in the country."—I thought then, and have often said, that had I ever been in the House of Commons I would have related this as an instructive lesson on the Irish priest question.

The Hussites.

Next day I dined at Aussig. There I fell in with a traveller who, finding I was going to the watering-place Teplitz, recommended me to a private lodging at the house of an honest shoemaker. In the afternoon I was there.

CHAP. V.
—
1801.
Teplitz.

Teplitz is a small but beautiful watering-place, in which is a château, occupied at the time by the Prince de Ligne, who is known as the friend of Madame de Staël. In this very agreeable little spot I took up my residence for six days. Here I found a circulating library (prohibited in other Bohemian towns), and in the beautiful country numberless walks. The season for drinking the waters was over, so that I found myself quite in retirement; but the residence of the Prince afforded me an unexpected pleasure the day after my arrival. I was told that there was an amateur theatre, at which the Herrschaften, the noble inhabitants of the château, performed; and to which any one decently dressed might go—the nobles in the pit below—the citizens in the gallery above. I presented myself at the door of the pit. "Sind Sie adelig, mein Herr?" (Are you noble?) said the doorkeeper.—"I am English," I said, "and all English are noble."—"I know it, sir," he replied, and opened the door to me. This I said, not meaning a joke, for everywhere in Germany English travellers are treated as if they were noble, even at the small courts, where there is no ambassador. No inquiry is made about birth, title, or place.

At the theatre a French comedy was acted, as it seemed to me with perfect good breeding. The little I saw in this performance of the Princess and the rest of the family was in harmony with the character they possess as being among the most amiable and respectable of the higher French noblesse.

I lived a week of great enjoyment—a sort of hermit's life. My breakfast consisted of grapes and cream—and certainly I never lived at so little cost. I soon formed an acquaintance with a young man—a Herr von Schall—who, like myself, seemed to have nothing to do. With him I spent my days in walking. In the course of talk he used the expression "one of my subjects" (Unterthan). "Unterthan?" I exclaimed; "why, you are not a sovereign?"—"Yes, I am," he said; and then he explained that he was a knight. I thought he had been a Suabian knight, but my journal calls him a Silesian. According to the now abolished old German constitution these knights were sovereigns, though they might be very poor. They had the power of appointing judges, in whom was the prerogative of life and death—a jurisdiction the knights could not personally exercise. I did not stand in any awe of my new companion, nor did he claim any deference on account of his princely dignity. He was a light-hearted young man, as may be seen by an anecdote he told me of himself. A few weeks before I met him, he had the misfortune, on his way to Teplitz, to be robbed of his purse. He was forced to take his portmanteau on his back and bring it to Teplitz, selling a pair of stockings on the road, in order to get food. Arrived here, and not expecting a remittance for some time, he announced himself as a painter, being an amateur artist. He waited on Count Brühl with his papers and testimonials, and solicited employment. The Count gave him a miniature to copy; this was finished in a day and a half, and three ducats paid for it. He went home, dressed, and in the evening went to a ball, where he met his employer the Count. Von Schall spent two ducats that evening—worked two days longer, and earned four ducats more. He then received a remittance from home, shut up his portfolio, told his story to everybody, the ladies he danced with included, and figured away as one of the beaux of the season.

Herr von Schall.

When I left Teplitz and my worthy host and hostess, Von Schall accompanied me over a mountain till we came within sight of Lobositz and Leitmeritz, when I entered the plains of Bohemia. I slept the first night at Budin, a poor little town; but I met there with a sort of adventure which I have often looked back upon with pleasure.

Judaism.

I was inquiring in the street for a circulating library—an idle inquiry, by the bye—when a very handsome young Jew came up and offered me a book for the evening. He accompanied me to the inn, and was my very agreeable companion, but would not suffer me to treat him. He had a fine manly expression, and talked with great freedom, which I encouraged by speaking of Moses Mendelssohn and Lessing, whom he naturally held in reverence. He seemed to have a taste for free-thinking books; and when I remarked that these books, if they were successful against Christianity, must be still more so against Judaism, he was embarrassed. He professed to hold Jesus Christ in the highest respect, but would not allow that he had ever claimed to be the Messiah. "Moses," he said, "if his claim to inspiration be waived, must still be allowed to be one of the greatest of men." On my asking whether the odium frequently cast on the Jews operated as a temptation to embrace Christianity, he replied, "You forget that we are brought up to that, and that we are trained to return contempt with hatred. All those I love are Jews. Were I to go over to your Church, I should become an object of hatred and contempt to all I love. My father and mother would die of shame; and, after all, by the respectable Christians converted Jews are more despised than those who remain firm. Fortune has made me what I am, and whatever difficulties my religion may have I know of none better." He said he did not believe there was anything miraculous in the Israelites' passage of the Red Sea. This young man lent me the continuation of "Nathan der Weise." The title of this continuation is "The Monk of Lebanon," and its object, to counteract the effect of Lessing's work.

Prague.

Next day eight hours' hard walking brought me to Prague—an imposing city, ancient and stately, containing 70,000 inhabitants. I have seldom seen a spot so striking as the bridge over the Moldau, with its thirty high statues. The view from this bridge of the cathedral on the hill is exceedingly fine. But, on the whole, I found little to detain me at Prague. Contrasting its churches with those at Dresden, I wrote to my brother: "The nine paintings in the Chapel at Dresden delight the eye. The hundreds at Prague only oppress the senses—the more so, as there is no classification or harmony in their arrangement. Old paintings, curious perhaps for their antiquity, are paired with flashy pieces glaring with varnish. A colossal statue stands by the side of a rotten relic; in one place there was a complete skeleton, the skull covered with satin, and the ribs adorned with crimson ribbon and tinsel.

CHAP. V. — 1801.

"'One would not sure look frightful when one's dead.'

Still more offensive were a long row of rotten teeth. Not all the objects, however, were of this class. At the high altar in St. Nicolai Church, I saw four colossal statues, not less than fourteen feet high. They impressed me solemnly, and I recollected the opinion expressed by Wieland, that size was probably the great charm which rendered so illustrious the Jupiter of Phidias."

On my way back to Pirna I was amused by the slyness of an inscription on a newly built wall. It was in verse, and its import as follows: "This house is in the hand of God. In the year 1793 was the wall raised; and if God will turn my heart to it, and my father-in-law will advance the needful, I will cover it with tiles."

I found I had still unseen beauties to explore in the Saxon Switzerland. Hohnstein I thought among the finest objects of this very delightful country.

On the last day of my tour, when I was at Hubertsburg, I met a party of show-folk and pedlars, and was treated both by them and the landlord as if I were one of them. A few months before I had dined at the same inn, as a gentleman visitor to the château. Then my dinner cost me 1*s.* 2*d.*—now I paid for my afternoon luncheon, supper, bed, and breakfast, 1*s.* 9*d.*—a difference more agreeable to my pocket than flattering to my vanity. But travelling on foot, I found that my journey, as a whole, cost me only a trifle more than I paid for my ordinary board and lodging at Frankfort.

With respect to the society in this district—the cultivation and manners of the higher classes—I have every reason to speak favourably. As far as I myself am concerned, I never before experienced from strangers so much civility ; and my external appearance was certainly not inviting, for I went as usual in black. My coat, which I brought with me from England, had necessarily lost much of its original brightness ; and it was rather eclipsed than set off by velvet pantaloons and gaiters, which I wore out of convenience, though they attracted now and then a smile from the honest villagers. I met uniformly with civil treatment in the public-houses, where I was always in high spirits, and by my gaiety generally gained the good will of my host and his other guests.

T. R. to H. C. R.

Bury, Oct. 20th, 1801.

The Peace.

. . . . The Peace is an event which has excited a tumult of joy such as I never before saw equalled. The effect was the stronger as the event was totally unexpected—indeed, for two or three days preceding, it was totally despaired of. The Funds were falling, and the expectation of an invasion was very general. All parties are therefore willing to give the Ministry great credit for the secrecy with which they conducted the negotiation. The demonstrations of joy have risen almost to madness. Illuminations have been general throughout the kingdom, and in London and some other places have been repeated several times. Last Friday we illuminated at Bury.

CHAP. V.
—
1801.

The papers will inform you of the reception which was given by the London populace to the French general who brought over the ratification of the preliminaries. It is said that "Long live Buonaparte!" was repeatedly cried in the streets; and among the transparencies exhibited in London his portrait was shown, with this inscription: "The Saviour of the World." Indeed it is curious to observe the change of style in the Government newspapers. The "Corsican adventurer," "the atheistical usurper," is now "the august hero," "the restorer of public order," &c. &c.; in fact, everything that is great and good. It reminds one of the transformation in a pantomime, where a devil is suddenly converted into an angel. The blessings of peace begin already to be felt. An abundant harvest promised a considerable reduction in the price of provisions, but the fall in corn has been rapid beyond example. In the course of about eight or ten weeks wheat has fallen in our market from 92*s.* to 13*s.* the coomb, and it is expected to sink lower. . . .

Seume.

On my return to Grimma, at the beginning of November, I became an inmate in the house of Mr. Riese; and there I remained during the winter. I spent my time pleasantly, partly in reading, and partly with friends. The best society of the place was freely open to me; and at about this period I became acquainted with a very remarkable person, of whom there is an account in the "Conversations-Lexicon," and to whom I became indebted for a great pleasure. His name was Seume, the son of a poor woman who kept a public-house near Leipzig. She meant to make her boy a parson, as he was clever; but he was wild, and after making some progress in his studies, left his books and took up a musket. He served in the American war as a private, and was afterwards a non-commissioned officer among the Hessians. He then went to the West Indies, and at length entered the Russian service—was lieutenant under Suwarrow, and was present at the infamous storming and sacking of Praga, near Warsaw. Meanwhile he pursued his studies, and became occasionally a tutor to young noblemen. For some years he corrected the press at Leipzig. He also printed some volumes of poetry, and gave lessons in Greek, English, &c. He knew almost all the European languages. His countenance was very striking. Herder remarked to me that he had the physiognomy of a Greek philosopher. With Seume I was to pay a visit to Weimar and Jena. At Leipzig we were joined by Schnorr, whose son has since attained great eminence as a painter. The father was, I believe, the master of the Government drawing-school at Weimar. We left Grimma on November 17th, and on the 19th I visited the most famous of the Fürsten-Schulen. The establishment had 150 scholars. The only particular I thought worthy of notice and imitation was a body of poor students called collaborateurs, and who assist the more wealthy but less advanced students, receiving for their trouble a salary of 200 dollars.

Weimar.

We arrived late the same day at the Eagle Hotel, Weimar; and the two next days belong to the most interesting in all my life. They were devoted to visits to the most eminent men of their age and country.

CHAP. V. — 1801.

Our first call was at the house of the aged Wieland. The course of my late reading had not led me to form terrifying ideas of his mental greatness, though as a littérateur he is one of the first writers of his country. He is not less universally read and admired in Germany than Voltaire was in France. His works amount to more than fifty volumes, all written for the many. He resembles the French wit in the lightness of his philosophy, in the wantonness of his muse (though it is by no means so gross), and in the exquisite felicity of his style. But he surpasses Voltaire in learning, if not in philosophy; for Wieland is no school-philosopher,— he belongs to the sensual school of Locke. And his favourite opinions are those of the common-sense, sceptical school. He is a sworn foe to the Kantian metaphysics, and indeed to all others. In his writings, as in his person and manners, he is a perfect gentleman. He received us with the courteous dignity of a sage, who accepted without hauteur the homage of his admirers. I have already printed an account of this my first and subsequent interviews with him in a note to Mrs. Austin's "Characteristics of Goethe."* I shall in substance repeat what I have there said. He had already shrunk into the old man. His pale and delicate countenance was plain, and had something of the satyr in it. He wore a black skull-cap. The marble bust by Schadow, which I have the good fortune to possess, is an exact resemblance of him. I ventured to refer to his philosophical writings, and especially to his "Agathodämon," which gives but a sad view of Christianity and its influence on mankind. In this book he draws a parallel between Jesus Christ and Apollonius of Tyana, whom he considers as alike generous enthusiasts, willing to make use of superstition in order to teach a beneficent morality. I ventured to express my regret at the mournful conclusions at which he had arrived. He admitted that his hopes of any great improvement in mankind were faint.

Wieland.

* Vol. II. p. 227.

To refer to another subject, the best if not the only advantage which in his judgment may be expected from the French Revolution is the promotion of the fine arts and the sciences; for he holds the French nation absolutely incapable of forming a Republic. He vindicated the administration of Buonaparte, and did not censure the restoration of the Roman Catholic Church. What he said on this point is worth reporting: "We Protestants allow ourselves a great deal of injustice and habitual falsehood towards the Catholics. We forget that Roman Catholicism is, after all, real Christianity, and in my judgment preferable to the motley things produced by the soi-disant Reformation."

The Reformation.

Speaking further of the Reformation, Wieland asserted that it had been an evil and not a good; it had retarded the progress of philosophy for centuries. There were some wise men among the Italians who, if they had been permitted, would have effected a salutary reform. Luther ruined everything by making the people a party to what ought to have been left to the scholars. Had he not come forward with his furious knock-down attacks on the Church, and excited a succession of horrible wars in Europe, liberty, science, and humanity would have slowly made their way. Melanchthon and Erasmus were on the right road, but the violence of the age was triumphant. It is needless to add that Wieland is a supporter of national religion.

Chap. v.
1801.

He spoke with great feeling of his wife, who had died a few weeks before. "I help myself with illusions," he said; "he whom I have once loved never dies to me. He is absent only from my outward senses; and that to be sure is painful. My wife was my good angel for thirty-five years. I am no longer young—the recollection of her will never be weakened." He spoke in a faint half-whisper, as from the bottom of his throat.

Böttiger.

My next call was on Böttiger—a very laborious book-maker and honest fagging scholar, noted for his courtesy to strangers, of which I both now and afterwards had the benefit. He had a florid complexion, and seemed to be in the possession of rustic health.

Goethe.

My companions then took me to Professer Meyer, who introduced us into the presence of Goethe—the great man, the first sight of whom may well form an epoch in the life of any one who has devoted himself seriously to the pursuit of poetry or philosophy.

I had said to Seume that I wished to speak with Wieland, and look at Goethe—and I literally and exactly had my desire. My sense of his greatness was such that, had the opportunity offered, I think I should have been incapable of entering into conversation with him; but as it was, I was allowed to gaze on him in silence. Goethe lived in a large and handsome house—that is, for Weimar. Before the door of his study was marked in mosaic, SALVE. On our entrance he rose, and with rather a cool and distant air beckoned to us to take seats. As he fixed his burning eye on Seume, who took the lead, I had his profile before me, and this was the case during the whole of our twenty minutes' stay. He was then about fifty-two years of age, and was beginning to be corpulent. He was, I think, one of the most oppressively handsome men I ever saw. My feeling of awe was heightened by an accident. The last play which I had seen in England was "Measure for Measure," in which one of the most remarkable moments was when Kemble (the Duke), disguised as a monk, had his hood pulled off by Lucio. On this, Kemble, with an expression of wonderful dignity, ascended the throne and delivered judgment on the wrong-doers.

Goethe sat in precisely the same attitude, and I had precisely the same view of his side-face. The conversation was quite insignificant. My companions talked about themselves—Seume about his youth of adversity and strange adventures. Goethe smiled, with, as I thought, the benignity of condescension. When we were dismissed, and I was in the open air, I felt as if a weight were removed from my breast, and exclaimed, "Gott sei Dank!" Before long I saw him under more favourable auspices; but of that hereafter.

Goethe has been often reproached for his hauteur, and Bürger made an epigram which the enviers and revilers of the great man were fond of repeating. I believe, however, that this demeanour was necessary in self-defence. It was his only protection against the intrusion which would otherwise have robbed him and the world of a large portion of his life.

H. C. R. to T. R.

Goethe's Iphigenia.

Goethe's "Iphigenia in Tauris" is perhaps the most perfect drama ever composed. I have read it three times within a month, and believe it has not a faulty line. W. Taylor has translated it. Do lay out half-a-crown on my judgment—fancy Mrs. Siddons to be Iphigenia—and you will feel that she is the most perfect ideal of the female character ever conceived, rivalling in that point of view even Milton's Eve. You will admire the solemn repose, the celestial tranquillity of her character, as well as of the events themselves; and this is, in my mind, the characteristic of Goethe. His better and more perfect works are without disorder and tumult—they resemble Claude Lorraine's landscapes and Raphael's historical pieces. Goethe's Songs and Ballads and Elegies all have the same character; his Ballads in particular have a wildness of fancy which is fascinating, but without turbulence. No hurry-skurry, as in Bürger's "Leonora." Apropos, I believe you will find in Monk Lewis a translation of a ballad called the "Erl-King"—hunt for it and read it. Goethe knows his own worth. In the whole compass of his works I believe not a single preface, or an article in which he speaks of himself, is to be found—it is enough that his works are there. . . . .

Herder.

The same evening I had an introduction to one who in any place but Weimar would have held the first rank, and who in his person and bearing impressed every one with the feeling that he belonged to the highest class of men. This was Herder. The interview was, if possible, more insignificant than that with Goethe—partly, perhaps, on account of my being introduced at the same time with a distinguished publicist, to use the German term, the eminent political writer and statesman Friedrich Gentz, the translator of Burke on the French Revolution, author of several Austrian state-papers against France, and the great literary advocate of the Austrian cause. I naturally kept in the background, contenting myself with delivering a letter which Madame de la Roche had given me. But Herder sent for me next day. He had a fine clerical figure, and reminded me of Dr. Geddes. His expression was one of great earnestness. Though he filled the highest ecclesiastical office the little state of Weimar afforded, yet the greatness of Goethe seemed to throw him into the shade; and this, perhaps, prevented him from appreciating Goethe's genius. For the present I shall content myself with saying that we had some controversial talk,—I not assenting to his contemptuous judgment of the English lyric poets, and he declaring the infinite superiority of Klopstock's Odes to all that Gray and Collins had ever written. We talked also about our English philosophers, and he gave me a shake of the hand for my praise of Hartley. Herder was a partisan of Locke.

Chap. v. — 1801.

Schiller.

Before I left Weimar I called on the one other great poet, Schiller, of whom unhappily I have as little to say as of the others. Indeed we were with him but a few minutes. I had just time to mention Coleridge's translation of Wallenstein, of which he seemed to have a high opinion. The translator was a man of genius, he said, but had made some ridiculous mistakes. Schiller had a wild expression and a sickly look; and his manners were those of one who is not at his ease. There was in him a mixture of the wildness of genius and the awkwardness of the student. His features were large and irregular.

The theatre at Weimar.

On Saturday night we went to the theatre, where I saw "Wallensteins Tod" performed in the presence of the author. Schlegel somewhere says, "Germany has two national theatres—Vienna with a public of 50,000 spectators, Weimar with a public of 50." The theatre was at this time unique; its managers were Goethe and Schiller, who exhibited there the works which were to become standards and models of dramatic literature. Schiller had his seat near the ducal box, Goethe an arm-chair in the centre of the first row of the pit. In general, theatres, whatever their size and beauty may be, are after all mere places where people, instead of sitting to enjoy themselves at their ease, are crowded together to see something at a distance, and it is considered a sort of infringement on the rights of others to take knee or elbow room. Here, on the contrary, I found myself in an elegant apartment, so lightly and classically adorned, and so free and easy in its aspect, that I almost forgot where I was. In the pit the seats are all numbered, each person has his own, and each seat has arms. The single row of boxes is supported by elegant pillars, under which the pit loungers stroll at pleasure. The boxes have no division except in front. They are adorned, too, by elegant pillars, and are open below; instead of the boards commonly placed in front are elegant iron palisades. There are no fixed seats, only chairs, all of which, in front, are occupied by ladies. The gentlemen go into the pit when they do not, as courteous cavaliers, wait behind the chairs of their fair friends. The box in the front is occupied by the Duke and Duchess with their suite, of course without the dull formality attending a Royal presence at Drury Lane. I beheld Schiller a great part of the evening leaning over the ducal box and chatting with the family. In the performance of this evening, I was pleased with Graff as the representative of the hero, and with Mademoiselle Jagermann as Thekla. She was a graceful and beautiful creature, the first actress of the company.

Kotzebue.

One other noted character we visited—the one who, according to William Taylor of Norwich, was the greatest of all. This was August von Kotzebue, the very popular dramatist, whose singular fate it was to live at variance with the great poets of his country while he was the idol of the mob. He was at one time (about this time and a little later) a favourite in all Europe. One of his plays, "The Stranger," I have seen acted in German, English, Spanish, French, and I believe also Italian. He was the pensioner of Prussia, Austria, and Russia. The odium produced by this circumstance, and the imputation of being a spy, are assigned as the cause of his assassination by a student of Jena a few years after our visit. He was living, like Goethe, in a large house and in style. I drank tea with him, and found him a lively little man with small black eyes. He had the manners of a petit maître. He was a married man with a large family, and seemed to be not without the domestic feelings which he has so successfully painted in his works. We were ushered through a suite of rooms by a man-servant, and found Mr. President in state. Nor is it unworthy of remark that his house had thirty-seven windows in front. Indeed, the comfortable style in which all the poets I have mentioned lived, would make me imagine the poet's fate must be singularly good in Germany, if I did not recollect that those I saw were the prime and elect of the German geniuses—the favourites and idols of their nation. Wieland and Goethe both gained a fortune by their writings, and Schiller supported himself entirely by his pen.

CHAP. V. — 1801.

The town of Weimar.

Weimar* is an insignificant little town, without an object of beauty or taste but its park; and even that

* A very interesting and detailed description of Weimar as it appeared in the eighteenth century will be found in G. H. Lewes's "Life of Goethe," vol. i., p. 311.

among parks has no great excellence. It has been immortalized by many a passage in Goethe's poems. His house will no doubt be preserved for the sake of its associations, and so probably will be the residences of the other chief poets. These, alas, have all passed away!*

Jena.

On Sunday, amid snow and rain and wind, we left the seat of the Muses for the school of the philosophers —Weimar for Jena. The University at the latter place has all the advantage of site, lying in a beautiful valley. The town itself, as approached from Weimar, looked interesting and promising as we descended the winding road called the Snake, but within it is a beggarly place. I at once made use of a strange letter of introduction given me at Göttingen by Winckelmann to a student here—a character—one Kölle, who, having passed through the ordinary years of study, continued to live here at the least possible expense, sauntering his time away, but by his conversation amusing and instructing others. He received me very cordially, though my introduction consisted only of my name with some verses from Goethe. Kölle took me to a concert-room, where I saw the students in genteeler trim than I had seen before. His enthusiastic talk about the poets and philosophers awakened in me the desire, which was afterwards gratified, of residing among them. We soon left Jena, and my companions, Seume and Schnorr, set out on that "Spaziergang nach Syrakus," an account of which was published. Seume in the first sentence says, "A few kind friends accompanied us a short distance." I was one of those friends.

* Written in 1847.

CHAP. VI. — 1802.

CHAPTER VI.

GERMANY.

1802.

I FINALLY left Grimma on May 4th, 1802. Brentano had finished his preparatory studies for the University, and wished me to accompany him to Frankfort. We intended to have gone thither by Carlsbad, but on my applying to Mr. Elliott for a certificate that I was an Englishman, he refused it very civilly on the ground that I had not a single letter or paper to corroborate my declaration. He said he had no doubt that I was what I declared myself to be, and he would speak in my behalf to the proper authorities. But Brentano objected to the delay, and we therefore changed our route, and took the opportunity of visiting some romantic scenes among the Fichtelgebirge, or Fir mountains—the birthplace of Jean Paul Richter. Here are some very curious rocks, well known and celebrated by travellers in search of the picturesque. Houses of entertainment have been erected, and are adorned with arbours, which are furnished with inscriptions. On a lofty rock, under which there is a rich spring, there are two hexameters, which I thus translated:

The Fichtelgebirge.

> "Here from the rock's deep recesses, the nymph of the fount pours her treasures; > Learn, O man, so to give, and so to conceal, too, the giver."

Ansbach.

On our arrival at Ansbach, which had recently been brought under the dominion of Prussia, we found in the peasantry an antipathy to the new Government, on account of their becoming subject to military conscription, from which the subjects of the ecclesiastical states and of the small German princes were free. I could not but notice that the peasants under the ecclesiastical Princes were unquestionably, in general, in a far better condition than those under the secular Protestant Princes. The Calvinists and Lutherans had certainly the advantage in intelligence, but they had worse bread and less meat than their superstitious brethren, who doffed the hat at the wayside shrines and repeated the Pater Noster and Ave Maria three times a day. It was my observation on this and subsequent occasions that the peasantry in the bishoprics of Bamberg and Würzburg appeared to be in a state of more ease and comfort than any I saw in Germany, excepting, perhaps, the Saxon peasants in the Mine mountains.

Erlangen.

In passing through the University town of Erlangen, I was pleased with the gentlemanly appearance of the students, though they had not the dashing impudence of the Cantabs or Oxonians. We supped at the head inn, where there were about fifty young men. Our polite host placed me by the side of Professor Abicht, and I was again struck by the concurrence of opinion among the German philosophers as to the transcendent genius of Shakespeare, Goethe, and Dante—the triple glory of modern poetry, and by the diversity of opinion as to the great principles of metaphysics. Abicht was the first German whom I had heard avow belief in Priestleyan necessity.

I also visited Nuremberg, famous for the manufactory of toys; and itself one of the most curious and national of cities. On the morning after our arrival, I arose early and walked out of the gates, and on my return was arrested by the guard; who ordered me to accompany him to the Governor. I observed that he carried some irons in his hand. The Governor received me courteously, examined my pass, asked me a few questions, and finding I was at the principal inn, dismissed me with the assurance that he was satisfied that I was an Ehrenmann (as we should say, a gentleman); "though," he added, "the sentinel was not to blame." In the course of the day he sent a powdered lackey to me with the message that he hoped I should not think worse of the city for what had happened. I asked the servant to explain the cause of my arrest, and he showed me a hue and cry after a merchant who had become a fraudulent bankrupt and fled. The signalement stated that the fugitive had on pantaloons and cloth gaiters!

Chap. vi. — 1802. Nuremberg.

Roman Catholic piety.

At Bischoffsheim, where Brentano had been at school, I was amused by the cordial simplicity with which the old women greeted him whom they had known as "little Christian;" one old woman exclaiming perpetually, "O thou holy Mother of God! O thou holy Antonius of Padua!" Another good creature said she had never forgotten to pray for him, but now that he had visited her, she would do it ten times oftener. I could not but notice that Catholic piety seemed more lively as well as more poetical than Calvinistic. I saw here in a poor cottage an edifying book, which delighted me by the beautiful simplicity of its style. It was entitled "Gnadenbilder" (Grace-working Images), and was a collection of tales of miracles wrought by images. The facts were briefly stated, with no assertion of their truth, and no dogma or imprecation against unbelievers; and each tale had its prayer. The prayers addressed to the Virgin were in a style of naïve and simple affection, quite touching; such as, "O thou chaste Dove, who feddest with holy crumbs the heavenly Babe!"—"O thou pure Swan, who sailest on the lake of Divine Grace!"—"O thou Arch of triumph, through which alone the Lord of Glory was permitted to pass!" Brentano afterwards became a zealous Romanist, and perhaps the circumstances of his early education had something to do with this change.

In a certain sense, many of us mutilate the mind and render it impotent, for there is in the nature of man an irresistible tendency to religion; it is founded in our wants and passions, in the extent of our faculties, in the quality of mind itself. Akenside's description of the untired soul darting from world to world, is a noble image of the restless longing of the mind after God and immortality. The stronger his sensibility, the more exalted his imagination, the more pious will every man be. And in this inherent and essential quality of our minds can we alone account for the various absurd and demonstrably false dogmas believed so honestly and zealously by some. Men run headlong into superstition in the same way as young boys and girls run into matrimony.

On reaching Frankfort I took up my abode there for a short time, and enjoyed the renewal of the society of

CHAP. VI.

1802.

Goethe's mother.

the Servieres, the Brentanos, and other former friends. The only incident I have to mention is, that once or twice I was in the company of Frau Rathinn Goethe,* who is almost an historic character through the supreme eminence of her son. She had the mien and deportment of a strong person. This impression of her is confirmed by the anecdotes related of her in the "Briefwechsel von Goethe mit einem Kinde," and indeed by every account of her. She spoke of her son with satisfaction and pride. In the course of her conversation she remarked, that Werter is not in the beginning the Werter of the end, and that it is only in the latter part of the work he may be said to represent Jerusalem—a young man who really killed himself because he received an affront in public. She spoke also of the origin of "Götz von Berlichingen." Her son came home one evening in high spirits, saying, "Oh, mother, I have found such a book in the public library, and I will make a play of it! What great eyes the Philistines will make at the Knight with the Iron-hand! That's glorious—the Iron-hand!"

H. C. R. TO T. R.

Frankfort, June 6th, 1802.

F. Schlegel.

A few days since I had the pleasure of conversing with F. Schlegel, one of the first living poets, and a great Æsthetiker; he is the brother of the translator of Shakespeare. He seemed much pleased with one or two pieces by Wordsworth. We talked of our English poets. He holds Spenser to be the greatest in respect to the melody of verse. "When I read him," says he, "I can hardly think it is a northern language, much less English." He holds his "Pastorals" to be his best work, and yet this is a book of which neither you nor I have read a word. I am resolved to leave my favourite authors and study those I have through mistaken notions or absurd prejudices neglected.

* Known under the appellation of Frau Rath Goethe in German literature.

I met lately with a declaration by Wieland concerning Shaftesbury—"The author," says he, "to whom I owe more of my cultivation than to any other writer, and of whom I never think without humility when I reflect how far below him I now am." And yet I believe Shaftesbury is quite unknown to you. Mendelssohn calls him the English Plato for richness of style, and for the genial poetic character of his moral philosophy.

While I was at Frankfort I received an invitation from Christian Brentano to join him at Marburg and accompany him to Jena. One of the places I passed through was the University town of Giessen, which seemed to me a poverty-struck and remarkably uninteresting town. It belongs to Hesse, and has recently derived celebrity from its great chemical professor, Liebig. In five days I reached Marburg, also the seat of a University, and beautiful and romantic in situation. Delightful apartments had been taken for me in the house of Professor Tiedemann, the author of a learned History of Philosophy. But I saw nothing of him or his family. His house was Giessen.

Marburg.

CHAP. VI. — 1802.

nearly at the top of the town, and from my pillow I had towards the east a glorious view of a long valley. I lay on a sofa of metal rings, covered with hair, the most elastic of couches, and to me a novelty. Adjoining this apartment were the rooms of the then Doctor Docens, or perhaps Professor Extraordinarius, von Savigny, who was commencing the professional career which ended in his being placed in the highest position in Prussia, that of Minister of State for the Law Department—a kind of Chancellor. He became the head of the historical school of law as opposed to the codifying school, of which in modern times Bentham was the most eminent advocate. Savigny's great work is a History of Roman Law. At the time of which I speak he was known by a learned work on Real Law, "Über Besitz" (on Possession). A dinner for four was brought up to his apartments every day, for him, the two Brentanos, and myself; and we usually spent the rest of the day together. Savigny was altogether different in his manner from the Brentanos—rather solemn in his tone. In the contests which constantly arose between them and me, I always found him on my side. He had a fine face, which strongly resembled the portraits of Raphael. At this very time he was paying his addresses to the eldest of the Miss Brentanos, Kunigunda by name. Several of her letters to him were sent under cover to me. I am ashamed to confess that, though I was fully sensible of the solidity of his attainments and the worth of his character, I had so little discernment as not in the least to foresee his great future eminence. Of his conversation I recollect only one thing that is characteristic. He said that an English lawyer might render great service to legal science by studying the Roman Law, and showing the obligations of English Law to it, which are more numerous than is generally supposed. One day I mentioned our fiction of a wager in order to try an issue, and he informed me that that was borrowed from the Roman Law.

Von Savigny.

CHAP. VI. — 1802.

The Castle of Wartburg.

After an agreeable residence of between five and six weeks at Marburg, I set out on foot with Christian Brentano for Jena. The only incident on the journey which I recollect, is a visit to the celebrated castle of Wartburg, where Luther underwent his friendly imprisonment, and made part of his famous translation of the Bible. On arriving at Jena I took up my residence in agreeable apartments,* and was at once introduced to a social circle which rendered my stay there, till the autumn of 1805, one of the happiest periods of my life.

Matriculation at the University of Jena.

Having resolved to become a student at the University, I matriculated on the 20th of October, the Prorector being Geheimerath (Privy Counsellor) Voigt. It required only a few dollars to become enrolled among the Academischen Bürger. The fees amounted to little more than half-a-guinea; but for the honour of Old England I contrived to spend nearly a guinea by increasing the gratuities to the under officers. I received in return a large piece of printed paper, with a huge seal, announcing in Latin that, on due examination, I had been found worthy to study all the arts and sciences. I had also acquired a variety of legal privileges, and contracted certain obligations. I solemnly promised not to knock anybody on the head, which I never felt any inclination to do: to enter into no clubs and societies, which nevertheless exist with the knowledge and connivance of the authorities: to employ all the knowledge I should gain to the advantage of religion and society—a promise which might be kept without, I fear, sensibly advancing either. And yet I took pains enough to get wisdom, for I went to school four times a day, and heard lectures on experimental physics, on æsthetics, on speculative philosophy, and on physical anthropology. The shortest way of giving an account of my uniform occupation during five days of the week will be by an extract from a letter:—

* My lodgings cost yearly somewhat less than seven pounds!—H. C. R.

CHAP. VI. — 1802.

University studies.

"About six o'clock the man who brushes my clothes and cleans my shoes will open my bedroom, or rather closet, door, and light my candle. I shall instantly jump out of my wretched straw hammock and go into my room, where in half an hour our pretty chambermaid will bring my dried carrots, called coffee, which I shall drink because I am thirsty, but not without longing after tea and toast. This done, I shall take up Schelling's 'Journal of Speculative Physics,' and, comparing the printed paragraphs with my notes taken last Friday, try to persuade myself that I have understood something. Then I shall listen to another lecture by him on the same subject. What my experience will then be, I can't say; I know what it has been."

I will interpose a sad but true commentary on the text. I very lately read, in the Prospective Review, an article by James Martineau, in which he says, "This is the age of metaphysical curiosity without metaphysical talent." In every age, I believe, there have been students of whom this might be said, and I do not repent of being one of them. I would rather have failed in the attempt than not have made it.

University studies.

"Precisely at ten I shall run to the Auditorium of his 'Magnificence,' the Prorector Voigt, and hear his lecture on Experimental Physics, which we call Natural Philosophy. I shall admire his instruments and smile at the egregious absurdity of his illustrations of the laws of nature, and at his attempts to draw a moral from his physical lessons. He may possibly repeat his favourite hypothesis of two sorts of fire, male and female; or allude to his illustration of the Trinity, as shown in the creative or paternal, the preserving or filial, the combining or spiritual principles of nature. Or he may liken the operation of attraction and repulsion in the material world to the debit and credit of a merchant's cash-book. (N.B. These are all facts.) Wearied by the lecture, I shall perhaps hardly know what to do between eleven and twelve o'clock, when I shall reluctantly come home to a very bad dinner. Jena is famous for its bad eating and drinking. Then I shall prepare myself for a lecture at two from Geheimer-Hofrath Loder, on Physical Anthropology, by far the best delivered and most useful of the lectures I attend. I shall do my best to conquer my dislike of, and even disgust at, anatomical preparations, and my repugnance to inspect rotten carcasses and smoked skeletons. And I expect to learn the general laws and structure of the human frame, as developed with less minuteness for general students than he employs on his anatomical lectures for students of medicine."

I add here that the museum of Loder enjoyed as high a reputation in Germany as that of John Hunter in England, and that the museum and its professor were together invited soon after this time to the Russian University of Dorpat—the malicious and envious affirming that the professor went as accessory.

University studies.

"From Loder I shall proceed to Schelling, and hear him lecture for an hour on Æsthetics, or the Philosophy of Taste. In spite of the obscurity of a philosophy in which are combined profound abstraction and enthusiastic mysticism, I shall certainly be amused at particular remarks (however unable to comprehend the whole) in his development of Platonic ideas and explanation of the philosophy veiled in the Greek mythology. I may be, perhaps, a little touched now and then by his contemptuous treatment of our English writers, as last Wednesday I was by his abuse of Darwin and Locke. I may hear Johnson called thick-skinned, and Priestley shallow. I may hear it insinuated that science is not to be expected in a country where mathematics are valued only as they may help to make spinning-jennies and machines for weaving stockings. After a stroll by the river side in Paradise, I shall at four attend Schelling's lecture on Speculative Philosophy, and I may be animated by the sight of more than 130 enthusiastic young men, eagerly listening to the exposition of a philosophy which in its pretensions is more aspiring than any publicly maintained since the days of Plato and his commentators—a philosophy equally opposed to the empiricism of Locke, the scepticism of Hume, and the critical school of Kant, and which is now in the sphere of Metaphysics the Lord of the Ascendant. But if I chance to be in a prosaic mood, I may smile at the patience of so large an assembly, listening, because it is the fashion, to a detail which not one in twenty comprehends, and which only fills the head with dry formularies and rhapsodical phraseology. At six I shall come home exhausted with attention to novelties hard to understand; and after, perhaps, an unsuccessful attempt to pen a few English iambics in a translation of Goethe's 'Tasso,' I shall read in bed some fairy tale, poem, or other light work."

This account of my first Semester studies may suffice for the present. Soon after writing the letter from which the above is taken, I was invited to a supper-party at Schelling's. The evening was a jovial one, and showed that philosophers can unbend as well as other folk; and as it was only in a convivial way I could expect to be listened to by a great metaphysician, I ventured to spar with the Professor. Some strange and unintelligible remarks had been made on the mythology as well of the Orientalists as the Greeks, and the important part played by the Serpent. A gentleman present exhibited a ring, received from England, in the form of a serpent. "Is the serpent the symbol of English philosophy?" said Schelling to me.—"Oh, no!" I answered, "the English take it to appertain to Schelling.

Chap. VI. — 1802.

German philosophy, because it changes its coat every year."—"A proof," he replied, "that the English do not look deeper than the coat." Though I shall have occasion again to speak of Schelling, I will here add that he had the countenance of a white negro, if the contradiction may be pardoned—that is, the curly hair, flat nose, and thick lips, without the colour of the African. After a time he was dethroned from his metaphysical rank by Hegel, who must have been his pupil.* Of him I have no recollection, though I find among my papers some memoranda of him. His philosophy was stigmatized as Pantheistic; Schelling managed to keep on better terms with Christianity. His learning is unquestionable, and he ranks among the first of German thinkers. Like his predecessors, he was fond of tracing a trinity in his scheme. The Absolute Being or All in All appears sometimes as the finite or nature, symbolized by the Son, who, according to the Christian revelation, is subject to the conditions of Time, like all natural and material things, and therefore dies; sometimes as thought or the infinite, having no form, the Spirit; and the union of the two, matter and spirit, is the Father. And thus who knows but that after all the Athanasian Creed will be resolved into high metaphysical truth?

Hegel.

Schelling.

It may be thought that these metaphysical puzzles have no business in a paper of personal recollections; but, in fact, these subjects occupied much of my time while in Jena—and never more than now.

* Hegel and Schelling were fellow-pupils at Tübingen. The former was five years the elder; nevertheless Schelling seems at first to have taken the lead in philosophy, and to have been of service to his friend.

CHAP. VI.
—
1802.
Professor Fries.

The old student Kölle, to whom I have already referred, introduced me to Professor Fries, the most distinguished Kantianer at that time, when the idealists of the Fichte and Schelling schools had nearly destroyed the Critical Philosophy. Fries was brought up among the Moravians, fond of talk, but of the simplest habits—a shy man. Almost the only treat he allowed himself was a daily walk to Zwätzen, a village about two miles from Jena, in the charming valley of which Jena is the metropolis. Around Fries collected a number of young men; and of his party I was considered an ordinary member. By him and by others I was well received, my chief merit being, I believe, there as elsewhere in Germany, that I was "der Englander." Nearly the whole of my time at Jena I was the only Englishman there. It was a passport everywhere. I could give information, at all events, about the language. With Fries I used to talk about the English philosophers, held very cheaply by him; but he wanted historical knowledge about them, which I was able to give. And he, in return, tried to inoculate me with Kantianism. The little I ever clearly understood I learned from him.

Frederick and Christian Schlosser.

On passing through Schlangenbad I fell in with a Major K——, a gentlemanly man, who gave me a card to two students who were connected with him—Frederick and Christian Schlosser. Christian, the younger, had a commanding intellect, and was a partisan of the new poetical school, as well as of the newest school of medical philosophy. His profession was that of medicine. He became a Roman Catholic, and his elder brother followed him. He died young. At the time of my writing this, Frederick is still living, and resides at Heidelberg, in a handsome house called the Stift, an ancient convent; he and his wife are both highly esteemed. The Stift is his own property; but he told me that as it had been Church property, and was confiscated at the Reformation, he did not purchase it until he had obtained the approbation and license of the Pope.

CHAP. VI. — 1802.

Before the end of the year I left off dining at home, and became an abonné at the Rose, the head inn, where my dinner cost five shillings a week. Here were the Schlossers and other students of the higher class, and the conversation was in the best University tone. I was often applied to, to read passages from Shakespeare. Christian Schlosser remarked one day at the Rose table-d'hôte, that in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the pervading idea is mésalliance—among the supernatural beings and on earth, matrimonial dissensions—in the comic characters also, when the mechanics presume to ally themselves to fine art. The Schlossers looked down upon the Kantian school, and therefore upon Fries. They and he, however, were united to a certain degree by a common love and admiration of Goethe. A third Schlosser, a cousin, was a nephew of Goethe, and there was a friendly acquaintance between the Schlossers and Clemens Brentano.

Mental phenomenon.

I may here relate a curious phenomenon of which I myself was a witness. The house in which I lived was large, and a number of students occupied apartments in it. There was no resident family, nor any female except a middle-aged woman, Aufwärterinn, (waitress), and a very pretty girl, Besen (broom), in the cant language of the Burschen—both respectable in their situation. It was the business of these women to let in the students at all hours of the night, and by so doing a habit was contracted of rising and opening the door without awaking. It became possible to maintain a conversation with both the woman and the girl without their being properly awake. Their condition seems to have been very much like what is now known as the mesmeric sleep. The particulars which I have to mention are still fresh in my memory, but I will copy from an account written by me at the time: "Last night, going into the kitchen for a candle, I saw the younger woman of the house in this extraordinary state, and listened to a dialogue between her and the elder: her answers were pertinent and even witty. One question put to her was, 'What sort of a man is Brentano?' She answered, 'The little fellow in the front parlour? Oh, he's a comical fellow—like his brother Clemens—but he was artig' (polite).—'And what of the Englishman?'—'Oh, he's a guter Kerl (a good fellow)—he's so fond of talking.' So you see what she said in her sleep was credible at all events. After several incidents, which I pass over, I spoke in my own voice, and asked for a candle; she recognized me, and without awaking took the light and accompanied me to my room. A few days later I witnessed some amusing but unwarrantable experiments on the elder woman, when she was in the same state. The inquiry was made whether she had any empty rooms. She replied, 'Oh yes!' and then in an artificial tone praised the rooms and named the price. Some of the questions were of a kind which I could not approve, and when at length she awoke she was very reasonably angry at the tricks which had been played on her."

Sleep-walking.

Chap. vi. — 1802.

On seeking for an explanation of these facts, I found that animal magnetism, so far from being considered in Jena as mere quackery, was received by the most esteemed natural philosophers as an admitted fact, and an important chapter in the natural history of man.

H. C. R. to T. R.

Mysticism.

"On all points, natural philosophy, religion, metaphysics, there seems to be a uniform opposition between German and English opinion. You say with truth I am growing a mystic. I rejoice to perceive it. Mystery is the poetry of philosophy. It employs and delights the fancy at least, while your philosophy, and the cold rational quibbles of the French and English schools, furnish nothing but negatives to the understanding, and leave the fancy and the heart quite barren. After all, what we want is strong persuasion, conviction, satisfaction; whether it be the demonstrated knowledge of the mathematician, the faith of the pietist, the presentiment of the mystic, or the inspiration of the poet, is of less consequence to the individual. And it seems that nature has sufficiently provided for this great blessing by that happy ductility of imagination which is called credulity."

So I wrote. But I should have thought more justly if I had said that the best provision of nature or providence (whichever name we give to the originating cause), for the fit cultivation of the spheres of nature, physical and moral, lies in the infinite varieties of human character. All the faculties which man has are found, generally speaking, in all men; but with infinite degrees of strength and quantity, and with varieties in combination.

The Monthly Register.

One of my employments during a part of 1802–3 was that of a contributor to a magazine entitled the Monthly Register, and edited by my friend Collier. The subjects on which I wrote were German literature, the philosophy of Kant, &c. I also gave many translations from Goethe, Schiller, and others, in order to exemplify the German theory of versification. As an apology for my being so much attracted to this subject, I quote on the epic hexameter,— > "Giddy it bears thee away, on the waves ever restless and rolling;

> And thou, behind and before, seest but ocean and sky."

I sent one really wise paper—a translation of an essay by Herr von Savigny on German Universities; for the rest, I unaffectedly declare that they attracted no notice, and did not deserve any.

[This will be the best place for a letter from Savigny, though written somewhat later, on the subject of University teaching.—Ed.]

Savigny to H. C. R. (Translated.)

Marburg, Jan. 9th, 1803.

Dear Robinson,

If you saw what a tremendous deal I have to do this winter, you would forgive me that I have not written to you before. Nevertheless I do not forgive

Chap. vi.
1802.

Savigny on the art of teaching.

myself, for I have all this time not heard from you, and that through my fault.

Moreover, in your letter you do me a wrong which I have to endure from many; you imagine you see in me a teacher full of noble views with regard to you. God knows how I have incurred this suspicion,—I, who perhaps am too off-hand with myself and others, and act and speak almost entirely according to my mood, and consequently as I feel at the moment, without any generous thought about the future. If I were to keep silent at such an accusation, my relation to you would be really a mockery; I should then put on a serious face, and could not help laughing at you in my heart.

About the oral lectures we are indeed of very different opinions, although I quite agree with you as to the method in which they are now given. If a rule is to be established on the subject, it is necessary first to leave out of consideration those real geniuses who are great in practice, though even these must find a place in the end. Such a genius Schelling is not—Fichte may partially have been; I have known only one such, and that was Spittler. To give one day full expression to my theory, and also to do something towards carrying it out, is a matter which I have especially at heart. Its principle is very simple: whatever man pursues, his own dignity, as well as the interest of the work, and of the subject itself, demands always that he should do it thoroughly. Thoroughly to do a thing means so to do it that the work shall penetrate our innermost being and thus become a part of ourselves, and then be spontaneously reproduced. Thus arise master minds who combine mastery of their subject with the maintenance of their individuality. But the only way in which we can make a thing our own is by thoroughly working it out. Therefore the whole art of a teacher consists in methodically quickening the productive energy of the pupil, and making him find out science for himself. I am convinced, therefore, that this is the one necessary method, and consequently that it is possible. Our lectures, as they are at present, have little resemblance to it; even in outward form almost everything must be changed. I see clearly the possibility of carrying out a great part of this plan,—the greatest difficulty being without doubt to teach philosophy in this way, although it may be supposed to have been the method of the ancients. Nothing can be more opposite than the diffuse way in which Schelling authoritatively forces his ideas on crude understandings, and this method, according to which it ought to be the highest glory of the teacher, if the pupils, with the greatest love and veneration for him, should nevertheless stand to him, the scientific individual, in no nearer relation than to any one else. The manner of lecturing should be in the highest degree unrestrained: teaching, talking, questioning, conversing, just as the subject may require. There is no calculating what must result from this; unquestionably the greatest difficulty would be to find a number of teachers adapted to it. Yet nothing is impossible. You see that this whole idea might be expressed from another side, by the demand that the free activity of the mind should be rendered possible by the complete mastery of the whole subject-matter.

Schelling.

CHAP. VI.
—
1802.

And, viewed from this point, it stands in very decided connection with the method of the excellent and enthusiastic Pestalozzi.

*   *   *   *   *   *

Last of all, because such is the custom, but in every other respect first of all, I beg the continuance of your friendly feeling.

SAVIGNY.

[Here also may be added two extracts respecting the fundamental principles of Kant's philosophy.]

H. C. R. TO T. R.

Kant's philosophy.

Kantianism professes to have detected the basis of metaphysical science, and to have established that science on a similar but not the same footing of sure evidence as the mathematical and natural sciences. It professes to annihilate scepticism, which is an eternal reproach to reason—(for what is scepticism but a confession of the impotence of reason?)—by showing the precise limits of knowledge, and the extent and degree of belief which we are compelled to give to notions that are not susceptible of certain evidence. In the study of Kant, independently of his grand result, I have learnt to detect so many false reasonings in our school, and have acquired so many new views of intellect, that I rejoice in having undertaken the study of him, though it has caused me more pain than I scarcely ever felt, and produced that humiliating sense of myself, the free and unexaggerated expression of which you have been pleased to consider as chimerical. I have indeed conquered one vast difficulty, and have at length pierced the cloud which hung over his doctrine of liberty. I am converted from the dogmatical assertion of philosophical necessity, but on grounds of which the libertarians in England have no conception. I will still support necessity against all the world but Kant and the Devil. Don't ask me for these grounds—they would be quite unintelligible till you had previously comprehended and adopted the Kantian theory of conceptions à priori, and of time and space. It was the fault of my last letter that I tried to say too much. I will confine myself at present to one single point, and I flatter myself that I shall make that one point intelligible. And I have hitherto found that to comprehend and to be a convert to Kant were the same. This point is the refutation of Locke's (or rather Aristotle's) famous principle, that there is nothing in intellect which was not before in sense, or that all our conceptions (ideas) are derived from sensation.

Kant's philosophy.

According to the empirical system, as stated in its utmost consistency by Horne Tooke, man has but one faculty, that of receiving sensation from external objects. But as it is certain we have innumerable notions and ideas which are not the copies of external objects, the empirics, particularly Hartley, explain how these super-sensible notions and ideas yet arise (mechanically according to Hartley) from such sensations. But here is a clear defect in the system; every operation supposes a power working and a power worked upon. Mere sensibility can give us only sensations, but it is certain we have a thousand notions which are not material and sensible. External objects may be, and unquestionably are, necessary conditions—the sine quâ non of ideas, but there must be something more. There must be in us a capacity of being so affected, as well as in external objects a capacity of affecting. And this something is à priori: not that in the order of time the conceptions (general ideas) exist before experience, but that the source of such conceptions is independent of experience. You will therefore not accuse Kant of supporting innate ideas, of which he is the decided adversary.

CHAP. VI.
1802.
Kant's philosophy.

What Kant asserts is, that in order to the arriving at knowledge there must be a matter and form; the former is furnished by the sensibility, the latter exists in the faculty of understanding. This word form is to you quite unintelligible. It was a long while ere I learnt its import. It is the Ass's Bridge of Kantianism. I will try to lift you over it. You have seen, I hope, a magic lantern. It is the best illustration I can find. In order to show off the figures, there must be a bright spot on the wall, upon which the coloured figures are exhibited. This is an image of the human mind. Without figures, the luminous spot is an empty nothing, like the human mind till it has objects of sense. But without the spot the figures would be invisible, as without an à priori capacity to receive impressions we could have none. The matter, therefore, of the dancing spectacle on the wall is the ever-shifting figure; its form is the bright spot which is necessary to its being shown. According to Leibnitz, the figures are ready made in the spot. According to Locke, no spot is necessary. Kant is the first philosopher who explained the true mechanism of that wonderful magic lantern, the human mind. When, therefore, it is said we have the conceptions (general ideas) à priori, it is not meant that the actual conceptions lie in us, even in a sort of dormant state—which would be a position without meaning, and hence equally incapable of being proved or disproved—but that they are, or arise from, the pre-existent capacity of the understanding, and are determined by the natural power of thinking which the mind possesses. In other words, conceptions à priori are but the forms of conceptions à posteriori, i.e. conceptions whose matter is derived from experience. Perceiving a ball on the edge of a table, which lies still till pushed off and then falls to the ground, the mind can observe this fact, remember it, and put it into words. But how is the mind enabled by this observation to infer that all bodies in a state of rest remain as they are till a foreign substance operates on them—or, in a more general form, that all events must have a cause? The pushing of a ball is not all events. And the fact that something is, is essentially different from the knowledge that something must be. The latter knowledge nature can never give, for nature gives only facts and things, but we have the latter conception. Your Hartley shows the circumstances under which these supersensible conceptions are called forth. His facts are denied by no one, but they do not prove the conceptions to be of sensible origin, any more than the warmth necessary to hatch an egg proves that the warmth is the principle of animal life. Conceptions themselves, which are essential to all knowledge, are

Chap. vi. — 1802. Kant's philosophy.

Chap. VI.
—
1802.
Kant's philosophy.

à priori—and not only conceptions, even intuitions—for instance space, which is yet generally considered as a general or abstract idea (i.e. conception). Now it is the characteristic of conception (or general idea) that it includes under it many individuals—as "man" includes Jack, Tom, and Harry; but when we think of space it is always as one whole. And different places are not like individual persons—distinct beings having only common qualities; but different places are only parts of space. How, then, did we come by the à priori intuition, space? You will say by abstraction; we unite all the places we have seen, imagine an infinity of others, and call the whole space. But, on reflection, you will find this process requires that we should set out with the notion of space, though your professed object is to leave off with it; for how could the mind have the consciousness "I am in a place," or, "This is a place," if it had not already a notion of space? I will state the example in another form. You have a conception of body. Most of its requisites or component parts are empirical, and all that you have acquired through experience you can imagine yourself not to have; for instance, you can dismiss at will colour, hardness, irresistibility, &c., but you cannot possibly think away space. In like manner you will find space to be included in all our intuitions of external objects, of which it is the form or condition à priori. In like manner, time is the formal condition, or sine quâ non, of all appearances whatever, for we cannot think of any thought or event which does not take place in time.

As time and place—which, however general they seem, must nevertheless not be considered as general ideas (to use our scandalously incorrect phraseology)—are à priori intuitions grounding all à posteriori intuitions (i.e. sensations of experience), so all our conceptions (or general ideas) must be grounded by à priori conceptions, which conceptions are grounded on the nature of the human mind and its laws of thinking. The philosophy which shows how these à priori conceptions and intuitions are the basis of all knowledge is called the Transcendental (or, if you will, the high-flying) Philosophy.

Kant's philosophy.

H. C. R. TO T. R.

1. Experience gives us the materials of knowledge, of which the form lies in the mind.

2. Consciousness is the ultimate source of all our notions, beyond which we cannot go, for we cannot step out of ourselves. This consciousness, when the subject of our thoughts, teaches us that we have a primitive productive faculty: imagination, whence everything is derived; sense, which opens to us the external world; understanding, which brings to rule the objects of sense; and further, reason, which goes beyond all sense and all experience—a faculty by which we attain ideas. (You know already the difference between idea and thought, &c.)

3. (And here I beg you to be very attentive, for I enter on a new topic, which I have hitherto not ventured to introduce.) There is in man a perpetual conflict between his reason and his understanding, whence all philosophical disputes arise, and which a

CHAP. VI.
—
1802.

Kant's philosophy.

critical investigation of the mind alone can solve. These disputes are of the following nature: The reason postulates a vast number of truths which the understanding in vain strives to comprehend. Hence the antinomies of pure reason. Hence it is easy to demonstrate the eternity and non-eternity of the world—the being and no-being of God—the existence and non-existence of a free principle. Kant has placed these contradictory demonstrations in opposition, and gave, more than twenty years ago, a public defiance to the whole philosophical world to detect a flaw in either side of these contradictory demonstrations: and no one has yet accepted the challenge. And the solution of the riddle is—

All these ideas, as ideas, have their foundation in the nature of the mind, and as such we cannot shake them off. But whether these ideas out of the mind have any reality whatever, the mind itself can never know; and the result is—not scepticism, which is uncertainty—but the certainty of our necessary and inevitable ignorance. And here speculative reason has performed its task. But now a second principle is started by Kant. This is practical reason.

Kant proceeds on the same experimental basis of consciousness, and grounds all his moral philosophy on the fact that we are conscious of a certain moral feeling I ought. Kant will not reason with him who disputes this fact, and excludes such an one from the rank of a rational and moral agent.

But the idea I ought includes in it I can; and as speculative reason is quite neutral on all these ultimate points of absolute knowledge, practical reason on this basis, weak as it seems, raises the vast structure of moral philosophy and religion. And the want of knowledge is supplied by faith, but a faith that is necessary, and, to an honest sound mind, irresistible. Its objects are God, immortality, and freedom—notions which all unsophisticated minds readily embrace, which a certain degree of reason destroys, but which, according to Kant, reason in its consistent application shall restore again to universal acceptance.

Kant's philosophy.

The seeming scepticism of the great results of speculative reasoning is favourable to the interests of religion and morality by keeping the coasts clear. I cannot, says Kant, demonstrate the being of God, nor you his non-existence. But my moral principle—the fact that I am conscious of a moral law—is a something against which you have nothing. This, as respects the first principle of morals and religion, and the reality and foundation of human knowledge, is the essence of the Kantian philosophy.

Student life.

Of the numerous students with whom my University life brought me into contact I shall not speak in detail; but I must say something about the student life, of which exaggerated accounts are current. In spite of the wildness and even coarseness of manners too generally prevalent, and though I was too advanced in age to be more than a looker-on at their amusements, yet I conceived quite an affection for the class. I thought I had never seen young men combining so many excellences of head and heart. Nearly all the

Chap. vi. — 1802.

undergraduates belonged to societies which were called Landsmannschaften—these Landsmannschaften being formed of the natives of separate countries or districts. Each held an occasional festival, called a Commers, to which it was a great privilege for an outsider to be admitted. I was never present at more than two. The first was with the Rheinländer—generally speaking, a warm-hearted, rough set. At these meetings only beer was drunk, but there was a great deal of smoking. There was, however, no excess to signify. Many Burschenlieder (student songs) were sung, some earnest, others jocular; but a gross song I never heard from a student, either here or elsewhere. Among the frequent practices was that of Schmollis trinken, which consisted in knocking glasses together, drinking healths, and kissing each other. After this the parties became Dutzbrüder,—that is, instead of greeting each other in the ordinary way by the third person plural, they made use of "thou;" and it was a legitimate cause of duel if, after Schmollis trinken, "Sie" was used instead of "Du." As I had drunk with scores of these Rheinländer, I used, in order to avoid all occasion of quarrel, when I met any one of them to say, "Wie gehts?" (How does it go?), instead of "How do you do?" which might be expressed in two ways. The only other grand Commers which I attended was with the Curländer. A Curland nobleman, a very young man, brought with him to the chief inn of Jena, where he stayed two days, an English lady, whom he represented as his wife. He had among the students personal friends, whom he invited to his inn. He was said to be a lieutenant-colonel in the English service; at all events he was an Englishman in heart, had the Anglomania in the highest degree, and for this reason invited me to join his party. His companion was young and very pretty, and as wild as a colt; and as she knew no language but English, she constantly applied to me to interpret the cause of the merriment which was going on—no slight task. In honour of this gentleman a grand Commers was given, which made me intimate with the Curland body.

Students' festivals.

Russian students at Jena.

It is a remarkable circumstance that the two bodies of students most opposed to each other in appearance and manners were both subjects of the Russian Empire—the Liefländer* and the Curländer.

The former were the petits maîtres—they dressed more smartly than any others, and were remarkably precise in their speech. Their German was said to be ultra-correct. The Curländer were the heartiest and most generous of youths, not superior in ability or scholarship, but among the most amiable. I find among my memoranda thirty-three Stammblätter (album-leaves) of engraved and ornamented paper signed by Curländer alone. It is the practice of students on leaving the University to exchange these tokens of remembrance. Those to which I have referred have revived tender feelings, but on looking over them I feel the truth and force of the words which fell from Madame de Staël on one occasion when I was with her. Goethe's son, a lad, called on her and presented to her his Stammbuch. When she had bowed Stammbuch and Madame de Staël.

* From Liefland or Livland, Livonia.

Chap. vi.
1802.

him out of the room she threw the book on the sofa, and exclaimed, "Je n'aime pas ces tables mortuaires!" Mortuary tables indeed they are. On one of those which I possess is written, "I shall never forget you, and I expect the same from you." But not even this memorial brings the writer to my mind.

Students' duels.

An account of a German University would be very imperfect without some mention of duels, which, from the great exaggerations generally circulated, have brought more reproach than is deserved. Generally speaking, they are harmless. Very few indeed are the instances in which they are fatal, and not often is any serious injury inflicted. I knew of only one case of the kind; it was that of a student who had received a wound in the breast, from which he said he should never cease to feel the effects.

Schelling said from the rostrum, "He that dares not boldly on occasion set his life at stake and play with it as with a top, is unquestionably one who is by nature unable to enjoy it, or even possess it in its highest vigour"—a hint which it is true was not wanted here, as in the course of the last six months near a hundred duels were fought.

At Jena the weapon used was the rapier, which with its three edges has certainly a murderous appearance; but honour is satisfied if a triangle appears in the flesh; a very slight wound is sufficient for that, and great care is taken that nothing more serious shall be inflicted. The combatants are made to stand at a distance from each other, and two seconds lie on the ground with sticks to interpose the moment their principals press too

Chap. VI.
—
1802.

Students' duels.

near. Thus A—┼—B (with C above and D below). A and B are the duellists, and C D the seconds, who beat down the swords when a wound is likely to be dangerous. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a flesh wound on the arm is all that is given. As the issue is usually so unimportant, a very slight offence is considered a sufficient cause for fighting. There is a code of honour among the students which might be derived from Touchstone's famous code as to giving the lie. For instance, if A says of anything that B says "Das ist comisch" (that is comical)—that is a Touche—an offence—which B must notice, or A has the "advantage" (Avantage) of him. Or if A says, "It's a fine day, upon my honour," and B says, "Upon my honour it's a dull day"—that's a Touche, for here the honour of one of two Burschen is in imminent peril. But it is not to be supposed that a fight can take place per saltum. Wherever a Touche has been received, the party sends his friend to the opponent's room with a Ziegenhainer (a stick cut from a neighbouring wood),* who, without pulling off his hat, asks what was meant. If the supposed offender says, "I meant nothing," or "No offence was intended," the affair is over; but a Bursch who is jealous of his honour, though he actually did mean nothing, is ashamed to say so, and then the usual answer is, "He may take it as he likes." Thereupon the second says, "A desires me to tell you that you are a dummer Junge, or a dummer Kerl;" that is, "You

* This wood, Ziegenhain, was celebrated for the knotted sticks cut from a kind of cherry-tree (Corneliuskirschen).

CHAP. VI.
—
1802.
Students' duels.

are an ass or a fool," or, as we should say in England, "You are no gentleman." This is the offence which blood alone can redress. But then, as I said before, it is only arm blood, not heart's blood. During my stay at Jena, it never happened but once that a man came to my rooms with a Ziegenhainer. The student who came was a sensible fellow, who volunteered in order to prevent a silly young fellow sending as great a fool as himself. The messenger threw down his stick and his hat, and burst out laughing; but very gravely took back my answer that I meant nothing. The sender was a young Hessian nobleman, and from that time I refused to speak to him.

On one occasion I was myself present when, in a beautiful and romantic valley a few miles from Jena, some half-dozen duels were fought with due solemnity, including one intermediate duel, which arose in this way: A wound having been received, one of the seconds cried out, "A triangle, on my honour." "No triangle, on my honour," answered the other. On this the seconds, sans phrase, stripped and fought, and the result being in favour of him who said "A triangle," his view of the matter was held to be established, and all four became as good friends as ever. It is to be understood that in these cases the parties still consider each other friends, though etiquette does not allow intercourse between them till the Ehrensache (affair of honour) is decided.

To connect great matters with small, as we constantly find them in human life, these duels in the Rauhthal had eventually a mighty effect on the fate of Europe. For in the famous campaign of 1806, Buonaparte having heard that there was a colonel in his army who had been a student at Jena, and foreseeing that Jena would be the seat of war, sent for him; and he rendered most important service. Buonaparte held the town, and on the high ground between it and Weimar was the Prussian army. The colonel led the troops through the Rauhthal, which he probably became acquainted with from fighting or witnessing duels there. The Prussians were taken in the rear, and this movement contributed to a victory which for six years kept Germany in subjection to France.

Chladni.

During my stay at Jena I had the opportunity of seeing a man of science whose name I have never heard in England, but who is mentioned with honour in the "Conversations Lexicon"—Chladni, the inventor of a musical instrument called the Clavi-cylinder, and the author of a work on the theory of sound.* He travelled in Germany, Italy, and France in order to make known both his instrument and his theory. All I recollect is some curious experiments intended to show the relation between vibration and form. A plate of glass was thinly strewn with sand, the string of a fiddlestick was drawn across the side of the plate, and instantly the sand flew to certain parts, forming figures which had been previously described.

* His name is repeatedly mentioned in Professor Tyndall's work "On Sound," where this very experiment is referred to.

CHAP. VII. — 1803.

CHAPTER VII.

GERMANY. 1803.

Schiller's Bride of Messina.

ON March 20th, 1803, I attended the first performance of Schiller's tragedy of "Die Braut von Messina." A visit to the Weimar Theatre was the occasional treat of the Jena students. The distance (from seven to ten miles) was such as to allow those young men who had more strength in their limbs than money in their purses, to walk to Weimar and back on the same day. This I have done repeatedly, returning after the play was over. "The Bride of Messina" was an experiment by the great dramatist, and it certainly did not succeed, inasmuch as it led to no imitations, unless the representations of "Antigone" a few years since, both in Germany and England, may be traced to it. In this tragedy Schiller introduced choruses, after the fashion of the ancients. The bride had two lovers, who were her brothers; the catastrophe is as frightful as the incidents are horrible. The double chorus sometimes exchanged short epigrammatic speeches, and sometimes uttered tragic declamations in lyric measure. I was deeply impressed, and wrote to my brother that this tragedy surpassed all Schiller's former works. But this feeling must have been caught from my companions, for it did not remain.

Goethe's drama, The Natural Daughter.

It must, too, have been about this time that Goethe brought out one of the most beautiful, though not the most popular, of his dramas, "The Natural Daughter"—a play meant to be the first of three in which he was to give a poetic view of his own ideas on the great social questions of the day. Eugenia, the well-born, is condemned to make an ignoble marriage for reasons which are left unexplained; otherwise she is to be consigned to a barren rock. The lawyer to whom she is to be married is represented as a worthy man, whom she respects. When she gives her consent, she exacts from him a promise that he will leave her mistress of her actions, and not intrude on her solitude. With her words "To the altar," the curtain drops. Herder professed a high admiration of the piece, but it is utterly unfit for a large audience. The character of Eugenia was beautifully represented by Jagermann, who combined dignity and grace. On my complimenting her on the performance she said, "If I played the part well it was by chance, for I do not understand the character."

Schiller's Maid of Orleans.

She would not have said this of another character in which I beheld her, though I do not precisely recollect at what time. I refer to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," which came out in 1801. A glorious work! It was well remarked by Hofrath Jung of Mainz, that the characteristics of French and German literature were well exemplified by the name and the quality of the "Virgin of Orleans" by Schiller and "La Pucelle d'Orléans" by Voltaire. Jagermann recited with great effect the lyrical passages, both when the inspiration seizes Joan, and the heroic conclusion. I suppose it is because the English make such a bad figure in this tragedy that it has never been introduced on our own stage.

CHAP. VII. — 1803.

Lessing's Nathan der Weise.

One other dramatic recollection I may mention. I saw at Weimar Lessing's "Nathan der Weise." The author pronounced a blessing on the town which should first dare to exhibit it to the world. He thought the lesson of tolerance would not be learned for generations. The play was adapted to the stage by Schiller, and the greatest actor of the day came to Weimar to perform the part of Nathan. Never probably, in any language, was the noble and benignant Jew more impressively represented than by Iffland. But the work has no dramatic worth. All one recollects of it is the tale of the rings, which was borrowed from Boccaccio.

Herder.

I went to Weimar twice in the beginning of 1803, to visit Herder. What I had previously seen of him made me feel that in spite of his eminence there were many points of agreement in matters of taste and sentiment, and caused me to approach him with affection as well as fear. I lent him Wordsworth's "Lyrical Ballads," my love for which was in no respect diminished by my attachment to the German school of poetry. I found that Herder agreed with Wordsworth as to poetical language. Indeed Wordsworth's notions on that subject are quite German. There was also a general sympathy between the two in matters of morality and religion. Herder manifested a strong feeling of antipathy to the new anti-supernatural school of Paulus. With all his habitual tolerance, he could hardly bear with the Jena professor, or with the Government which permitted such latitudinarianism. Yet he was attached to Wieland personally, who was certainly no Christian. Herder was also tolerant towards anti-Christian writers of past generations. He was a warm admirer of Shaftesbury, of whom the worst he had to say was that he wrote like a lord. His repugnance to some of Goethe's writings was perhaps still stronger than to those of Paulus ; and he reprobated with especial warmth "Die Braut von Corinth," and "Der Gott und die Bajadere." Though in some respects the anti-supernatural professor was as opposite as possible to the poetic and anti-metaphysical divine, yet they were in sympathy in their hostility to the modern German philosophy of the Kantian and post-Kantian schools.

Paulus.

Of Paulus I myself had some personal knowledge. Notwithstanding his well-known opinions, he was one of the regular theological professors and members of the senate in the University of Jena. In the following year he was invited by the Catholic King of Bavaria to the University of Würzburg. No wonder, it may be thought, for that would be an effectual mode of damaging the Protestant Church. But he did not long remain under a Roman Catholic government, for he was soon called to occupy a high place in the University of Heidelberg. He was a laborious scholar and a very efficient teacher, and always respected for his zeal and activity. During the present session he lectured on the Epistles of St. Paul, and on Dogmatic Theology, and held every Saturday a theological conversation. I went one day as a visitor to hear his lecture, and having already re-

CHAP. VII.
—
1803.

Who is a Christian?

ceived some kindness from him, ventured to call on him afterwards, when the following conversation took place. Referring to the lecture I had heard, I said, "Herr Geheimer-Kirchen-Rath (Mr. Privy-Church-Counsellor), will you oblige me by telling me whether I heard you rightly in a remark I understood you to make? It was this—that a man might altogether disbelieve in miracle, and of course all prophecy and inspiration, and yet be a Christian." His answer I distinctly recollect: "Don't imagine, Mr. Robinson, that I mean anything personally disrespectful when I say that that seems to me a foolish question (eine dumme Frage)."—"How? Is that possible?"—"Why, it implies that Christianity may have something to do with inspiration, with prophecy, or with miracle; but it has nothing to do with them. (Es hat nichts damit zu thun.)"

Paulus, when a young man, visited England, and had corresponded with Geddes. He also told me that he saw Dr. Parr, and had received letters from several of the bishops; but he said, "Your English theologians did not much please me. I found but one man who really interested me, and him I consider one of the most excellent men I ever saw. This was Robert Robinson of Cambridge; with me he is the beau-ideal of a Christian minister.* I loved him even for his weaknesses. With all his peculiarities, he was thoroughly liberal. In his attachment to the Baptists there was a union of child-like simplicity and kind-heartedness that was quite charming." Paulus spoke of Priestley as superstitious.

* Robinsoniana, by H. C. R., will be referred to in a later part of this work.

Griesbach.

Griesbach, the famous Biblical scholar, was an older and soberer man; I visited him in his garden-house, but have retained no particulars of his conversation.

Kilian.

Among those who held the office of Doctor docens at Jena was one Kilian, who wrote as well as lectured on a system of medicine. The proof sheet of the preface was shown me, from which I extracted a sentence to this effect: "The science of medicine does not exist in order to cure diseases, but there are diseases in order that there should be a science of medicine." In the same book I was shown some verbal corrections made by himself. Wherever he had written "God" he struck it out and substituted "The Absolute."

Gries.

Living at Jena, but neither as professor nor student, was Gries, who afterwards acquired reputation as the best translator in rhyme of the romantic poets. He was chiefly known by his versions of Ariosto and Tasso, but he also translated from the great Spanish dramatist Calderon.

A walking tour.

On the 4th of April I closed my academical term by setting out student-fashion on a walking expedition, and had between three and four weeks of high enjoyment; for which, indeed, nothing was requisite but health, spirits, and good humour, all of which I possessed in abundance. I determined to take the opportunity of visiting Berlin, and on my way passed through the University towns of Halle and Wittenberg. The latter is known to every one as the place whence Luther promulgated the Reformation. The town, however, with its sunken University was disappointing; but I still retain a recollection of the portraits of Luther and

CHAP. VII. — 1803.

Melanchthon. Both of them lived and preached and are buried here. Their monuments are very simple—merely a brass plate on the ground with the common inscription of dates, and the two full-length portraits. The acute and sarcastic countenance of the one, and the bull-like head of the other, are strikingly contrasted. Mildness is the recorded virtue of Melanchthon; but had subtlety and craft been his qualities, I should have thought the portrait expressed them.

Berlin.

Berlin, as a city, gave me little pleasure. A city in which the sovereign prince applies the revenues of the state to the erection of opera-houses and palaces has never been an agreeable object in my eyes. I hastened on my arrival to deliver a letter of introduction to one of the Berlin notabilities, and indeed one of the remarkable men of the day. He is entitled to a grateful notice from me for his generous hospitality; and what I have to say will not be altogether insignificant as illustrative of character. No one who has paid any attention to the German literature of the eighteenth century can be ignorant of the name of Frederick Nicolai, the Berlin publisher. And those who know of him merely as the object of the satires of Goethe and Schiller, Tieck and the Schlegels—that is, of the most splendid writers in Germany—may be excused if they think of him as little better than an ass. But as he would have greatly erred who took his notion of Colley Cibber from Pope's "Dunciad," so would they who fancied Nicolai to be the arch Philistine of the authors of the "Xenien." The fact is, that Nicolai was really a meritorious and useful man in his younger days; but he lived too long. He was neither more nor less than an active, clever fellow—full of enterprise in the pursuit of inferior objects which he attained, but destitute of all sense of the higher and nobler ends of science and literature. When I visited him he was in his seventieth year. He had been brought up by his father to the bookselling business, and had received a learned education. Early in life he became the friend of Lessing—the most honoured name of that age—and of Moses Mendelssohn. In 1765 he established the famous Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek (Universal German Library), a review which was as important in its day as, for so many years, our Monthly Review was. But what that Review now appears to be in comparison with the Edinburgh, the Quarterly, and some others of a subsequent period, such is the Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek compared with numerous works of the modern German schools. When Lessing was gone, Nicolai could not engage men of equal rank to supply his place, and, unable to discern the signs of the times, became the strenuous opponent of the moderns. When age and youth commence a warfare, which is to last, every one knows which will be the conqueror. "Denn der Lebende hat recht," says Schiller ("For he who lives is in the right"). Now, it unfortunately happened that Nicolai ventured to oppose himself—and that in the very offensive form of coarse satire—to the two great schools of philosophy and poetry; of philosophy in the persons of Kant and Fichte, and of poetry in the person of Goethe. In a novel entitled "Leben und Meinungen Sempronius Gundiberts," which he gave me, the hero is a sort of metaphysical Quixote, who, on Kantian

Nicolai.

German literature.

Chap. VII.
1803.

principles, acts like a fool. Nicolai's best book, "Sebaldu Nothanker" was translated into English by Dutton Nicolai also brought out a squib against the "Sorrows o Werter," when at the height of popularity, and called i "Werter's Joys." Werter's pistol-shot only wounds hin
—he recovers—marries Charlotte—and sustains the mos disgraceful calamity that can befall a husband. Many years afterwards Nicolai wrote a clever play, in whicl Kotzebue's "Stranger" and the hero of Goethe's "Stella are made to be the same, and the Stranger is represente as compromising with his wife, receiving her back on con dition of her living with him in partnership with Stella Such was the Berlin publisher who attained a kind o literary notoriety. I did not approach him with awe but I found him a most lively, active, and friendly man His conversation was without bitterness. I told him o my fondness for some of the objects of his satire, whicl did not seem to displease him. He was still editor o a periodical, a small insignificant monthly magazine entitled Neue Berliner Monatschrift. A number, whicl he placed in my hands, contained a very foolish pape on the opinions of the English respecting the German —full of absurd, vulgar falsehoods about the English such as that they can sell their wives according to lav by taking them to market with a rope round thei necks, &c. Nicolai said, "Write me word what you think of it;" and so I did. It was my amusement on my return to Jena; and I own I was pleased to find, on receiving a parcel from Berlin, that my answer was printed in full without corrections, and with a complimentary preface by the editor.

Nicolai's satires.

Chap. vii. — 1803.

Deaf and Dumb Institution.

While at Berlin I paid a visit to the Deaf and Dumb Institution. Some of the pupils evinced so much perception, that I might have supposed the deafness feigned if there had been any motive for deception. They are not all dumb, for many of them, by imitating certain movements of the lips and tongue, can produce sounds which they themselves do not hear, and thus make themselves understood. In the dark, the pupils write on each other's backs and feel the words. I observed that one young man did not understand me so well as he did others. The preceptor said my foreign manner was puzzling.

Next day I met a pupil in the street, who smiled and took me by the hand, when this dialogue took place: I said, "Which is the way to St. ——'s Church?" He made a flourish in the air with his hands, in imitation of a cupola with a spire above. It was the form of the church. I nodded assent. He pointed to a street, and stretching out his right arm, struck it twice, with his left hand; then for the outstretched right arm substituted the left, and finished by one stroke on the left arm with the right hand. So that I at once understood that I had to take the second turning to the right, and the first to the left. Nothing could be clearer or more correct. I shook hands with him at parting, and he appeared delighted at his success in rendering me this little service.

The Opera and Theatre.

I thought the Opera-house very splendid. I saw there "The Island of Spirits," founded on Shakespeare's "Tempest," with a skilful omission of everything beyond the story that could recall the great dramatist to the mind. Prospero's character was ruined by his appearing to be dependent on a spirit floating in the clouds, whose aid he implores; and Caliban was a sort of clown, unmercifully thrashed as the clown is in our pantomimes. I saw also a comic vaudeville, with jokes of a bolder character than I should have expected. A dispute arises about geography, and an old map being brought, the remark that Germany and Poland are terribly torn was warmly applauded. I saw Iffland in a sentimental melodrama by Kotzebue—"The Hussites before Naumburg." He charmed me by his tender and dignified representation of an old man.

Chap. vii. — 1803.

Anton Wall.

The only occurrence on my way back to Jena worth noting took place at the little town of Altenburg, where I was asked at the inn whether I would not call on Anton Wall. Now Anton Wall was the nom de guerre of a writer of romances, in which he availed himself of Oriental imagery and machinery with humour and grace. Especially had his "Amatonda" pleased me.* It is considered not an intrusion, but a compliment, at all events by the minor writers, when a traveller calls on an author. The singular habits of Anton Wall might render such a visit peculiarly acceptable; for, though he did not pretend to be ill, he had literally taken to his bed, and there in a garret had lived for years. He had his books near, and dreamed away his time, writing occasionally. I introduced myself as an Englishman, and he was evidently flattered by finding himself known to an Englishman. He inquired which of his books I had read, and when I said "Amatonda," he told me that the poetical brother was intended for Jean Paul. This tale relates how a magician, dying, tells his three nephews that the only way to secure happiness is by finding the fairy Amatonda; but he dies without keeping his promise to any one of the three, that he would tell them where she is to be found. The two elder brothers set out in search of her. The eldest fancies she must be glory, and becomes a warrior and statesman ; but adversity overtakes him, and in old age he returns to his uncle's house a cripple and in poverty. On his way back he falls in with the second brother, who had pursued the fairy in literary fame, and was equally unsuccessful and wretched. They find the third brother at home with a wife and children, and in the enjoyment of the happiness of which they had gone forth in search. He said to them, "I did not think it worth while to go out of my way in pursuit of the fairy; but she might come to me, if she liked, and she did come. She made her appearance to announce that the true Amatonda is a good wife." With Anton Wall I had a long chat. He was remarkably clean in his person, and there was an air of neatness and comfort in his apartment, which itself, though a garret, was spacious. He himself was a compound of kindliness and vanity. It was thought he was rather crazy, but he was universally liked. He was fond of giving treats to little children; and girls used to come to him to receive lessons. In announcing his "Bagatellen," Schlegel in his Athenæum says, "These are genuine 'Bagatellen,' and that is not a trifle,"—a compliment which Anton Wall heard from me with satisfaction.

* Afterwards translated by H. C. R. Anton Wall is the nom de guerre of Christian Leberecht Heyne.

Amatonda.

CHAP. VII.
—
1803.
Second session at the University.

I commenced my second session at the University of Jena much more auspiciously than the first. My position was very much improved, and I was in excellent health and spirits. As to my studies, I determined to endeavour to make up for my want of an early grammar-school education. It is not without a feeling of melancholy that I recollect the long list of Greek and Latin authors whom I read during the next two years.* That I never mastered the Greek language is certain; but I am unwilling to suppose that I did not gain some insight into the genius of Greek poetry, especially in its connection with philosophy.†

H. C. R. TO HIS BROTHER.

Jena, June 2nd, 1803.

Dear Thomas,

. . . . I have changed my lodgings, and have at present one of the best in the town. My sitting-room has four sash-windows opening into a beautiful walk of lime-trees, and affording a fine hilly prospect. Now, too, that spring is come, I find Jena one of the most beautiful spots I ever dwelt in. It stands in the centre of a valley of more than fifteen miles along the Saale, which in its course has many a picturesque winding, and passes through many pleasing villages. I have likewise remarked in myself two very happy changes. The one is that I can amuse myself without suffering ennui in mixed society, and that I

* The list includes the principal authors in both languages.

† Private lessons from an old student cost me three dollars six groschen for two months.

have lost that eager thirst after new books which is rather a disease than a passion. I can now take a walk without a book in my pocket, and can be at ease if I do not find on my desk a new, unread publication.* . . .

I have introduced among the students games at leap-frog and jumping over ditches; and I attribute much of my well-being now to these bodily exercises. In short, I am without care and very lively, and withal by no means idle. I write or study attentively eight hours every day.

Schelling.

Notwithstanding my study of the ancient languages, I attended a course of lectures by Schelling on methodology; and I fancied I had a glimpse of light every now and then. He pointed out the relation of the several sciences to one another, but dwelt chiefly on religion and jurisprudence, and said but little of the physical sciences. I will insert here a recollection, which seems to me important, and the accuracy of which was corroborated by one who ranks among those who have advanced the philosophy of science, and especially in connection with magnetism: I refer to Dr. Neeff. Schelling said, "We are accustomed to consider magnetism, electricity, and galvanism three distinct sciences; and in a certain sense they are, inasmuch as the facts belonging to them are arranged in three classes. But in truth the magnetic, electric, and galvanic powers are only various forms of the same thing; and before many years have elapsed some experimental naturalist will come forward and exhibit visible proofs of this fact."*

* At all events during the last forty years of his life, Mr. Robinson never took a walk without a book in his pocket.

Chap. VII. — 1803.

Schelling on Bacon and Newton.

I kept up my acquaintance with Schelling by occasionally calling on him; and, during one of my visits, I ventured to remonstrate with him on the contemptuous language he used respecting our great English authors, even Bacon and Newton. He gave the best turn he could to the subject by saying, "Because they are so dangerous. The English empiricists are more consistent than the French." (I doubt this, by the bye, so far as Locke is concerned.) "There is Bacon, a man of vast talents, but a most mischievous philosopher. He and Newton may be regarded as the great enemies and destroyers of philosophy in modern times. But," he added, "it is no small matter to be able to do so much harm."

Voss.

The name of Voss will have a lasting place in the history of German literature. He is known and prized as the greatest of German translators from the Greek. Especially is his "Homer" considered a masterpiece. To this he owes his fame. The one drawback on his good name is the acrimony of his polemical writings. He was an elderly man at the time I was introduced to him—in his person tall and thin, with a sharp nose, and a sort of lanky figure—a compound of subtlety and

* "In 1812 Oersted went to Germany, and whilst there he wrote his essay on the Identity of Chemical and Electrical Forces, thus laying the foundation for the subsequent identification of the forces of magnetism, electricity, and galvanism. In 1819 he made the announcement of his great discovery of the intimate relation existing between magnetism and electricity."—Eng. Cyclop., Article "Oersted." "Faraday read his first paper on Magneto-electric Induction before the Royal Society on the 24th Nov. 1831;" "his paper on Identity of Electricities on Jan. 10th and 17th, 1833, also before the Royal Society." —Faraday as a Discoverer, by John Tyndall.

naïveté. He was living retired and quite domesticated. He was the son of a Mecklenburg peasant, and used to be called a "gelehrter Bauer" (a learned peasant). To this circumstance some ascribed the absence of good manners in controversy; but I would rather ascribe a great portion of it to his intense conscientiousness. He was a rigidly virtuous man, and a Protestant; and seemed hardly able to tolerate any departure from what he thought right and true. Roman Catholicism he called Jesuitism. When his noble friends, the Counts Stolberg, whom in his youth he must have deemed it a high honour to know, went over to the Roman Catholic Church, he treated the change as if it were hardly short of a crime. Nor was he much better able to bear difference of opinion on matters of taste. Hence his furious disputes with Heyne, the learned Göttinger, and (but that was later) with Creuzer, the mythologist. The latter explained the Greek and Roman mythology, as Voss thought, mystically. I was quite unable to make him see the beauty of Dryden's exquisite translations from Horace,—such as the "Ode on Fortune." Indeed, his love of English literature was nearly confined to Shakespeare and Milton, of both of whom he always spoke in high admiration. And he affirmed that Milton might, had he pleased, have successfully introduced hexameters into English poetry.

Voss's Protestantism.

Voss's Louisa.

Voss's "Louisa" is the rival of "Hermann und Dorothea," and has perhaps more admirers. He is delicate in his descriptions, and paints and describes nothing but the simple, the noble, the modest, and the good. But this turn of mind, which prevents his being a great poet, makes him one of the best men imaginable.

CHAP. VII.
1803.

It was understood that Voss's time for receiving callers was after supper, and I frequently availed myself of the opportunity of seeing him. For, with all his infirmities of temper and his narrowness, there was in him an integrity, a simplicity, a purity, which placed him in the very first class of men combining great mental power with the highest moral qualities; and it was no slight merit in my eyes, that he loved Goethe and Wieland, notwithstanding the extreme difference between his literary tastes and theirs.

Wolf.

I once saw at the house of Voss the accomplished scholar Wolf, who had in Germany, in my time, as high a reputation as at the same time Porson had in England. Wolf's commanding person and figure of themselves attracted attention to him. His friendship with Voss was cemented by their united opposition to Heyne. Voss told me that he and Wolf used to dispute which owed most to Heyne. Both had been his pupils; one had subscribed to two courses of lectures, and heard a single lecture,—the other had subscribed to only one course, and had heard three lectures. Voss's attachment to Wolf may be regarded as a great and rare act of liberality, seeing that he altogether dissented from Wolf's theory concerning Homer.

Homer. Voss used to say, "It would be a greater miracle had there been many Homers, than it is that there was one." On the other hand, Goethe has an epigram in which he gives the health of him who freed the poets from the tyranny of the single-one, with whom no one would dare to contend; "but to be one of the Homeridæ is beautiful." This he said in allusion to his own "Achilleis," a continuation of the "Iliad."

Wolf frequently said good things. I heard Voss relate this mot of his against Meiners. He quoted some Latin book of Meiners', "Minertis de," &c., and remarked, it would have been better if the learned professor had written "Minertii de," but he always through life thought proper to decline himself according to iners.

Madame de Staël.

When Madame de Staël came to Weimar, Voss was told that she wished to see him. He coolly replied that she might come. But she would have been sadly perplexed if she had taken him at his word; for he would not have spoken French to her. He was indignant at the homage paid to foreigners by speaking their language. "I should think it my duty," he said, "to learn French before I went to France. The French should do the same."

Voss.

Out of his own peculiar line of philological and archæological study, he was not a man of great acuteness. When his poetical works were reviewed by Goethe in the Jena Literarische Zeitung, I was afraid he would take offence at what seemed to me some awkward compliments. For example, "While other poets raise to themselves the objects they describe, our amiable author descends to their level and becomes one of them." Goethe was speaking of the Idyllists, the class to whom Voss belonged. But my apprehension proved to be groundless. Goethe praised affectionately, picking out excellences and passing over defects, after his fashion, and Voss was well pleased. His "Louisa" is certainly a masterpiece, though I cannot but think Wordsworth greatly mistaken in prizing it more highly than "Hermann und Dorothea."

CHAP. VII. — 1803.

Jacobi.

In the same house I once met the famous philosopher Frederick Jacobi, with whose personal dignity and beauty I was much struck. He was, take him for all in all, one of the handsomest men I ever saw. He was greatly respected. I should have said universally, but for the odium he incurred from the Romanist party.

He spoke with great respect of my friend Fries, and said, "If he be a Kantianer, so am I." Jacobi is at the head of a school of thought which has attracted men of feeling and imagination, but which men of a dry and logical turn have considered a corruption of philosophy. Yet opposed as he was to the critical philosophy on account of its dryness, and to the poets for their supposed want of religion, he was to no one's taste precisely. Some accused him of intolerance. But I believe it lay in his warm style, rather than in his heart. Goethe, however, seemed never to be quite reconciled to his way of showing religious zeal.

At the beginning of session 1803-4, the list of Jena professors showed a serious loss, no less than seven having left, including Schelling, Tennemann, Paulus, and Hufeland, a distinguished jurist. But another loss, which soon followed, affected me personally still more. It arose out of the New Year festivities.

The New Year.

It is a custom at Jena, as at other German Universities, to celebrate the New Year by a midnight frolic. The Burschen assemble in the market-place, and when the town-clock strikes twelve, they shout a perea to the Old Year, and a vivat to the New. Like base and disgraceful sycophants, they forget the good and exaggerate the evil the departed year may have brought, and dismiss it without ceremony to the shades. They then hail the new-comer with the complimentary salutation, "Das neue Jahr soll leben!"—as we should say, "The New Year for ever!" Squibs and crackers frequently accompany this celebration. Now it is obvious that the darkness of night and the excitement arising from the Commerse which have probably taken place, are not unlikely to lead to more or less rioting, especially if during the year offence have been given to influential Burschen. The previous year about thirty houses had their windows broken without resistance, or subsequent notice by the authorities. On the present occasion I did not anticipate any disturbance, and therefore, after supping with the Curländer, retired to my rooms before the stroke of the clock. Unluckily, however, a tradesman had given offence by sending a girl to Bridewell, and a body of students showed their displeasure by breaking a few panes of glass at his house. In an instant a number of hussars appeared, and a skirmish arose, in which the students, few in number, and these few more or less intoxicated, were driven out of the market-place. The cry resounded, "Bursch heraus!" like the cry of "Gown against Town" at Cambridge, and the students came again into the field. The Prorector, who corresponds to the Cambridge Vice-Chancellor, was called up, and the demand was made that a wounded student who had been taken to the watch-house should be set free. This was refused, and the hussars returned.

Quarrel of students with town authorities.

CHAP. VII.
—
1803.
Quarrel of students with town authorities.

The affair was already bad enough, but the student made it worse by a most indecorous memorial, whicl they called a petition, and in which they demanded a amnesty in behalf of the implicated students, compen sation for what was considered an insult in the callin out of the military with fixed bayonets, and a pledge o the part of the Government that on no occasion in futur should troops not garrisoned at Jena be sent fron Weimar. In case these demands were not complie with, 204 students pledged themselves to leave th University at Easter. Among the subscribers were th Curländer, Rheinländer, and nearly all my persona friends. I, being a sort of privileged person, was no pressed for my name, though a blank was left for it On the part of the academical senate, the negotiatio was put into the hands of one who had no savoir fair The result was that conference served rather to wide than to close the breach. Both parties secretly wishe for a reconciliation, for the professors were unwilling t lose their pupils, and the students were aware tha nowhere else could they enjoy so many advantages at s little expense; and yet neither were prepared to mak the necessary concessions. Thinking myself perhaps suitable person to interpose, I called on seven of th leading members of the senate. But meanwhile th matter had been laid before the Duke, whose pride wa wounded by the insult offered to his soldiers; and h gave peremptory orders, which rendered all reconcilia tion impossible. I shall mention more in detail by-and by an application made by me to Goethe in behalf o the students. It was of no avail.

CHAPTER VIII.

GERMANY. 1804.

THE prospect of losing so many friends was to me a real sorrow, and I should have felt it still more deeply had not my interest in University studies been weakened by other pursuits, and especially by the very interesting acquaintance which I formed in the month of January (1804) with a lady who then enjoyed a European reputation, and who will have a lasting place in the history of French literature. I received a note from Böttiger, the curious beginning of which is worth translating: "Madame de Staël, from whose lips flow spirit and honeyed speech (Geist und Honigrede), wishes to make your acquaintance, dearest Sir and Friend. She longs for a philosophical conversation with you, and is now busied with the Cahier (notes) on Schelling's 'Æsthetics,' which I possess through your kindness. She has, indeed, translated some portions of them with admirable skill." I was then requested to fix a day for dining with her. I was delighted with this invitation, and knew how to interpret Böttiger's flattering expressions in reference to myself. He further begged me to draw up a sketch of Schelling's "All-philosophia," as he termed it, adapted to the Verstandswelt, i.e. the world of the ordinary understanding and common sense as opposed to the philosophical reason. With this request I complied not that I imagined myself competent to write sentence which would satisfy a German philosopher, bu I thought I might render some service to a Frencl lady, even though she were Madame de Staël.

Madame de Staël.

CHAP. VIII. — 1804. Madame de Staël.

On the 28th of January I first waited on her. I wa shown into her bedroom, for which, not knowin Parisian customs, I was unprepared. She was sitting most decorously, in her bed, and writing. She had he night-cap on, and her face was not made up for the day It was by no means a captivating spectacle, but I had very cordial reception, and two bright black eyes smile benignantly on me. After a warm expression of he pleasure at making my acquaintance, she dismissed m till three o'clock. On my return then I found a ver different person,—the accomplished Frenchwoman sur rounded by admirers, some of whom were themselve distinguished. Among them was the aged Wieland There was on this, and I believe on almost every othe occasion, but one lady among the guests: in this in stance Frau von Kalb. Madame de Staël did not affec to conceal her preference for the society of men to tha of her own sex. If I mistake not, this dinner wa followed by five others during her short stay at Weimar but my memoranda do not enable me to assign th exact dates of the conversations to which I have nov to refer.

She said, "Buonaparte sent his Marshal to me"— think it was Caulaincourt—"to say that he would no permit me to receive company; that he knew I was hi enemy—and that my house was open to all his enemies

Madame de Staël.

I might remain at Paris, if I liked, but I must live alone. Now, you must be sensible that is impossible, and therefore I set out on this journey. I do not think it prudent to go to England at present. Buonaparte pretended, and it was asserted by order in the Government newspapers, that his displeasure with me was not on account of himself, but because I was a partisan of foreign literature, and therefore a depreciator of the literary glory of France." This I may say, that she had a laudable anxiety to obtain a knowledge of the best German authors; and for this reason she sought my society, and I was not unwilling to be made use of by her. She said, and the general remark is true, "The English mind is in the middle between the German and the French, and is a medium of communication between them. I understand you better than I do any German with whom I have ever spoken." But this, it must be borne in mind, was at the beginning of her residence in Germany, and long before her acquaintance with August Wilhelm Schlegel.

The Duke of Weimar.

One day after dinner the Duke came in. She introduced me to him, saying, "J'ai voulu connaître la philosophie allemande; j'ai frappé à la porte de tout le monde—Robinson seul l'a ouverte." The day after she said to me, "How like an Englishman you behaved yesterday! When the Duke came in you were in the middle of a story, and after a slight interruption you went on with it. No German would have dared to do this. With a sovereign, it is always understood that he is to begin every subject of conversation. The others answer questions and follow." I replied, "I see I was quite wrong—I ought not to have gone on."—"Perhap not; but I was delighted with you for doing it." Thi subject was introduced by her in connection with th remark that she could at once see whether or not German was accustomed to good company, but not a Englishman. Then she abruptly said, "Are you rich ? I at once felt that this was not a complimentar question, especially so introduced, so I answere evasively, "As you please to take it; I am either a ric man of letters, or a poor gentleman,"—and with tha she was content. She expressed her pleasure at th manly and independent tone of my conversation wit the Duke, and her contempt for the servile habits o some of the Germans.

CHAP. VIII.
—
1804.

Goethe's Epigrams.

When alone with her, it was my great aim to mak her feel the transcendent excellence of Goethe. But failed. She seemed utterly incapable of realizin wherein his excellence lay. But she caught by sym pathy a portion of that admiration which every one fel for him. Among those excellences which she wa unable to perceive was that of naïveté. I read to he some half-dozen of Goethe's most subtle and exquisit epigrams. That, for instance, in which, after lamentin that his mistress having jilted him, and the Muses don the same, he, because he could not write, peered abou for a halter or a knife. "But thou camest," he conclude "to save me, Ennui! Hail, Mother of the Muses! Enumerating the fine arts which he practised, "Bringin one only near to perfection," he says; "and so, miserabl artist, I threw away my art on the worst of material writing German!" She could not comprehend thes

She was precisely what Charles Lamb supposes all the Scotch to be—incapable of feeling a joke. Having tried her with a number of these ironical epigrams, I read a commonplace one against the German sovereigns for speaking French at their courts. "See what comes of it? Your subjects are only too fond of talking French," meaning French principles. This she thought admirable, and took down. Her success in spoiling a fine thing was strikingly shown in connection with a noble saying of Kant, which I repeated to her: "There are two things which, the more I contemplate them, the more they fill my mind with admiration—the starry heavens above me, and the moral law within me." She sprang up, exclaiming, "Ah, que cela est beau! Il faut que je l'écrive,"—and years after, in her "Allemagne," I found it Frenchified thus: "Car, comme un philosophe célèbre a très bien dit: Pour les cœurs sensibles, il y a deux choses." The grave philosopher of Königsberg turned into a "cœur sensible!"

Kant.

It is very apparent from the correspondence of Goethe and Schiller that these two great poets regarded her visit to Weimar as an infliction. Schiller would not go near her, and Goethe made himself scarce. There was a report that she extorted from the latter, by some advice on his "Natürliche Tochter," this reply, "Madam, I am more than sixty years old!" But this is not after his fashion. I know, however, that she did speak irreverently of that masterly work, and provoked me to the utterance of a very rude observation. I said, "Madame, vous n'avez pas compris Goethe, et vous ne le comprendrez jamais." Her eye flashed—she stretched out her fine arm, of which she was justl vain, and said in an emphatic tone, "Monsieur, je com prends tout ce qui mérite d'être compris ; ce que ne comprends n'est rien." I bowed lowly. This wa said at table. After dinner she gave me her hand ver kindly. "I was angry for a moment," she said, "bu it is all over now." I believe I owe the favour experienced from her to my perfect frankness, and eve freedom.

Schiller and Goethe.

CHAP. VIII.
1804.

The Bride of Corinth.

One day, in the presence of Böttiger and others, sh read a translation of that "Scheussliches Gedicht" (ac cording to Herder), the "Braut von Corinth." The mos material point—indeed I might say the peccant point—sh had not perceived, and therefore it was left out. Whe she ceased there was a burst of praise from every on but myself. "Et vous, Robinson, vous ne dites rien."— "Madame, je m'occupe en pensant si vous avez compri le véritable sens des mots." And then I read the word significantly. Böttiger began, "Madame a parfaitemen rendu le vers."—"Taisez-vous !" she exclaimed, paused moment, and then, giving me her hand, said, "Vous tou m'avez louée—Robinson seul m'a corrigée ; Robinson je vous remercie." Yet she had pleasure in being com plimented, and took it as a sort of right,—like a quit rent, not requiring thanks, but a receipt. I must eve quote one of the very few gallant speeches that I hav ever made. Before her journey to Berlin, her court dress for the King's birthday ball was produced at tabl after dinner. It was highly extolled by the guests. Sh noticed my silence. "Ah, vous, Robinson, vous ne dite rien ?"—"Madame," I said, in a tone of assumed gravity

"vous êtes un peu exigéante. Je ne puis pas admirer vous et votre robe au même temps."—"Ah que vous êtes aimable!" she exclaimed, and gave me a smile, as if she had said, "I know this means nothing, but then these are the things we expect. You are really improving." For English frankness, abstaining from all compliment, had been my habit.

The Duke of Weimar.

My irregular recollection takes me back to the day when the Duke joined our party. She was very eloquent in her declamation, and chose as her topic an image which she afterwards in her book quoted with applause, but which, when I first mentioned it to her, she could not comprehend. Schelling, in his "Methodology," calls Architecture "frozen music." This she vehemently abused as absurd, and challenged me to deny that she was right. Forced to say something, I made my escape by a compliment. "I can't deny that you have proved—que votre esprit n'est pas gelé."—"Fort bien dit," the Duke exclaimed; and certainly any way of getting out of such a challenge was better than accepting it. There has appeared since in English a treatise on Greek Architecture bearing the significant title, "The Music of the Eye."

Proposal that H.C.R. should go to Berlin.

I will conclude what I have to say of Madame de Staël personally, before I notice her companions. After some half-dozen dinners, and as many or more tête-à-têtes, she went to Berlin, from which place she wrote to me, proposing that I should remove to Berlin, take a lodging in her neighbourhood, and be her constant guest at table. She would introduce me to the literary world at Berlin. This proposal was too advantageous

CHAP. VIII. — 1804.

to be declined. Such an introduction would hav offered me probably more advantages than I could hav profitably made use of. I made up my mind to remov in the summer. It was, therefore, with much sorrow tha
I heard, first, of the death of her father, the ministe Necker, and then that she had arrived at Weimar, t stay a few days on her way to Switzerland. I of cours waited on her. She was loud in her expression of grie at the loss which she had sustained. But her feelin was sincere. It would be judging uncandidly to infe that she did not feel because she had leisure to b eloquent. Among her declamatory bursts was this "Oh! il n'était pas mon père. Il était mon frère, mo fils, mon mari, mon Tout!"

Benjamin Constant.

I will now refer to those with whom I becam acquainted through her, or whom I saw in her compan
Of these by far the most eminent was Benjami Constant. The slanderous world, at least in Franc has always affected to consider him her lover. In society so generally profligate as that of the Parisia beau-monde, where the ascertained fact would b scarcely a subject of blame, and where any expresse doubt of the truth of the report would expose him wh dared utter it to contempt, no wonder that this amou was taken for granted. It would never have occurred t me. She appeared to be the elder, and called him "Mo Benjamin," as she might have done a son or a younge brother. He, on the contrary, never spoke of her lightly but always with respect as Madame de Staël. At he table he occupied the place of the master of the house he was quite the ami de la maison. The worst thin about him was that he was separated from his wife, to whom it was said he had been a bad husband. He was a declared enemy to Buonaparte, and was a member of the Tribunat which Buonaparte abolished. After the Restoration he became a distinguished member of the Legislative Body. He was by birth a Swiss. As a man of letters he was highly esteemed, and had a first-rate reputation as a philosophical jurist. A zealous anti-Romanist, he wrote on Christianity. I should call him rather a sentimental than a Bible Christian ; but I should not be warranted in saying that he was an anti-supernaturalist. A novel of his, "Adolphe," was said to favour free opinions on marriage. I heard that he had translated Godwin's "Political Justice," and inquired whether he had really done so. He said he had made the translation, but had declined to publish it, because he thought it might injure the good cause in the then state of public opinion. Sooner or later, however, the work was to be published, for he regarded the original as one of the master-works of the age. In saying that his tone towards Madame de Staël was respectful rather than tender, I do not mean that it was deferential towards her opinions. On the contrary, his opposition was unsparing, and though he had not her colloquial eloquence, I thought he had always the advantage of her in argument. One remark on the French national character was made by him, which is worth quoting. I inquired whether Buonaparte really possessed the affections of the French people. He said, "Certainly not. But the French," he added, "are so vain, that they cannot bear the insignificance of neutrality, and will affect to belong to the triumphant party from an unwillingness to confess that they belong to the conquered." Hence Robespierre and Buonaparte have both, in their respective times, had the tacit support of a nation which in reality was not attached to either of them.

Godwin's Political Justice.

Wieland.

I have already said that Wieland was the most distinguished of Madame de Staël's German visitors. He was frequent in his attendance on her, and loud in his admiration. One day, when she was declaiming with her usual eloquence, he turned to me, and exclaimed, "Dass ich, in meinem hohen Alter, solche eine Frau sehen sollte!" (That I, in my old age, should see such a woman!) I had remarked to her that of all the German great writers his mind was the most French. "I am aware of it," she said, "and therefore I do not think much of him. I like a German to be a German."

A. W. Schlegel.

I, at the same time, told her that of all the then eminent writers, the two Schlegels were those who possessed in a high degree, and beyond all others, that peculiar mental quality which the French call esprit, as distinguished from genius, understanding, &c.; and I advised her to cultivate the acquaintance of A. W. Schlegel, who was then at Berlin. She did what I advised, and more; she engaged A. W. Schlegel to reside with her in the character of tutor to her children. And, in fact, the knowledge she would obtain from him was in every respect so superior to anything I could communicate to her, that I take very little credit for any part I may have had in supplying the materials of her book. There, are indeed, many opinions in the book which Schlegel probably would have protested against being thought to have suggested. Yet she said to me years after, "You know very well that I could never have written that book without the assistance of Schlegel." But all that is best in that work, the section on life and manners in Germany, came from herself alone.

Johannes von Müller.

Next to Wieland, the most eminent visitor whom I recollect seeing at her table, was the famous Swiss historian Johannes von Müller of Schaffhausen. I saw him frequently, and what I remarked in him deserves to be noticed as bearing on his life and conduct in middle age. He is the most illustrious of literary turncoats on record,—if he deserve that degrading character, which possibly he does not.

When he first made himself known as a political writer, he was librarian to the Elector of Mayence; and in that position he wrote, in 1782, a famous pamphlet on the celebrated visit of the Pope to Joseph II. at Vienna. In this pamphlet, entitled "Reisen der Päbste," he represented the Papal power as exercised in favour of popular liberty against the great military governments. His next and still more famous pamphlet was the "Fürstenbund" (League of Princes), written in 1787, and advocating the cause of the Princes of Germany against the House of Austria. This was followed by his entering into the service of the Emperor. In that service he remained many years. During this time he continued the great work on which his fame chiefly rests, "The History of the Swiss League," which he commenced when young, and which was, in fact, the business of his life. On the subject of his connection with the Austrian Government, I heard him say: "The Government passed a law which was aimed at me particularly. It was a prohibition of all subjects printing any book out of the dominions of the Emperor. The moment this law was passed I made my preparations for quitting Vienna. I began by sending out of the country all my MSS. and my papers of every description. I sent them in small parcels by many persons, and not one was lost." When I saw him at Weimar he was, as I learn from the "Conversations-Lexicon," on his way to Berlin. He at this time entered into the service of the King of Prussia. Yet my impression was that the tone of his conversation was by no means favourable to the Prussian Government. And being, as he was, anti-French in his feelings, though perfectly liberal in his political opinions, and a sturdy Protestant, he might well be hostile to that fatal policy which for a time made Prussia the ally of France, and the tool of Buonaparte. After the fall of the Prussian Government, Müller went into the service of the King of Westphalia, in which he died in 1809; and, as I heard, stayed by his death proceedings against him for writings in opposition to the Gallo-German Government to which he belonged. Notwithstanding his having served so many rulers of an opposite character, my impression, from what I saw and heard of him, was, that he was an honest and conscientious man, and that, like many others who have incurred the reproach of inconsistency, he acted on the maxim of doing all the good he could in any station in which he might at the time be placed, —not hesitating to leave that station when he found himself no longer able to do good in it.

CHAP. VIII. — 1804. Johannes von Müller.

Müller's German pronunciation was extremely disagreeable. It was excessively Swiss, i.e. the guttural sounds were exaggerated in it. His French, on the contrary, was agreeable.

Schiller's Wilhelm Tell.

While he was at Weimar I witnessed the performance of "Wilhelm Tell," when the following incident took place. In the last act an occurrence is introduced for the sake of a great moral contrast, though at variance equally with history and dramatic unity. Parricida, the murderer of the Emperor, is coming on the stage, and the murder is spoken of. On the evening to which I refer, when Müller was present, there was introduced, as I understood for the first time, this passage: "How do you know it?"—"It is certain; a man worthy of credit, Johannes Müller, brought it from Schaffhausen." The name was pronounced aloud, and was followed by uproarious applause. It was talked of next day as a joke. But in my edition the passage stands in the text without any note.

Court of Weimar.

At Madame de Staël's house I first became acquainted with several of the Weimar court, and so the way was prepared for that introduction which in the following winter became of some importance. My name was known pretty generally. A prominent court lady was Fräulein von Geckhausen, a shrewd lively little woman, who noticed me obligingly. Since her death the gossiping books speak of her as malignant and intriguing; for myself, however, I have none but agreeable recollections of her. She read to me a short note to Madame de Staël, in which the compliments seemed to me to have an extravagance bordering on insincerity. I therefore ventured to say, "Do me the favour, Fräulein, to read that in German." She began, stammered, and stopped. "Das lässt sich nicht Deutsch sagen." (You can't say that in German.)—"I know you cannot; shall I tell you the reason why? The German is an honest language, and your German habits are honest. When, therefore, you have anything to say of mere compliment, which means nothing, you feel as you say, 'Das lässt sich nicht Deutsch sagen.'"

Fräulein von Geckhausen.

Schiller.

In the present University session I saw a little of Schiller, but not much. He had always the appearance of being unwell. His amiable wife, and her very clever sister, and indeed all those who were about him, appeared to watch over him as an object of solicitude. While the admiration excited by Goethe was accompanied by awe, that which was felt towards Schiller was mixed with love and pity. I may here mention that at the end of a very early, if not the first, performance of "Die Braut von Messina," a young doctor, son of the learned Professor Schulz, the philologer, rose in the pit and exclaimed, "Schiller der grosse Dichter soll leben" (Long live Schiller, the great poet)! The numerous students in the pit all joined in the cry, and there was a regular three times three of applause. But this was regarded as a great impropriety and breach of decorum in the presence of the Duke and Duchess, and we heard that young Schulz received a severe reproof from the Government.

Goethe.

In March, 1804, I had a re-introduction, and not a mere formal one, as the first was, to Goethe. It was at the theatre. He was sitting in his arm-chair, in the front row of the pit. I had repeatedly taken a seat near enough to him to have an occasional glimpse of his countenance, but I never presented myself to his notice. On the evening of which I write, I was sitting immediately behind him. Benjamin Constant came in with him, and after shaking hands with me, whispered my name to Goethe, who immediately turned round, and with a smile as ingratiating as his ordinary expression was cold and forbidding, said, "Wissen Sie, Herr Robinson, dass Sie mich beleidigt haben?" (Do you know, Mr. Robinson, that you have affronted me?)—"How is that possible, Herr Geheimerath?"—"Why, you have visited every one at Weimar excepting me." I felt that I blushed, as I said, "You may imagine any cause, Herr Geheimerath, but want of reverence." He smiled and said, "I shall be happy to see you at any time." I left my card, of course, the next morning, and the next day there came an invitation to dinner; and I dined with him several times before I left the neighbourhood of Weimar.

Goethe on Venice Preserved.

It was, I believe, on the very evening on which he spoke to me in the theatre, that I asked him whether he was acquainted with our "Venice Preserved." "Oh, very well—the comic scenes are particularly good." I actually started at so strange a judgment. "Indeed! in England those scenes are considered so very bad, that they are never acted."—"I can understand that; and yet, on reflection, you will perceive that those scenes are quite essential to the piece. It is they alone which account for, and go near to justify, the conspiracy; for we see in them how utterly unfit for government the Senate had become." I recognized at once the truth of the criticism, and felt ashamed of myself for not having thought of it before. In all his conversation he spoke in the most simple and unpretending manner, but there was in it remarkable significance,—a quiet strength, a power without effort, reminding me of what I read of a painting, in which a man was wrestling with an angel. An ignorant man abused the picture on the ground that in the angel there was no sign of effort—no muscle was strained. But this was designed to show the angelic nature. It is the same in the Greek sculpture of the gods.

Dinner at Goethe's.

When Madame de Staël returned from Berlin, and brought A. W. Schlegel in her train, I dined at Goethe's with Schlegel, Tieck the sculptor, and Riemer. No one else but Madame Goethe was present. I was struck by the contrast between Schlegel and Goethe. Nothing could exceed the repose of Goethe, whereas on Schlegel's part there was an evident striving after pun and point. Of these I recollect nothing but that Böttiger was his butt, whom he compared to Bardolph. From Goethe I remember a word or two of deep significance. He said to Schlegel, "I am glad to hear that your brother means to translate the 'Sakontala.' I shall rejoice to see that poem as it is, instead of as it is represented by the moral Englishman." And there was a sarcastic emphasis on the word "moralischen." He then went on, "Eigentlich aber hasse ich alles Orientalische." (But, in truth, I hate everything Oriental.) By which, probably, he meant rather that he infinitely preferred the Greek to the Oriental mind. He continued, "I am glad there is something that I hate; for, otherwise, one is in danger of falling into the dull habit of literally finding all things good in their place,—and that is destructive of all true feeling." This casts some light on his sentiments respecting the two religions which had their origin in the East. And yet this might have been a transient feeling, for in less than ten years he withdrew himself from the contemplation of the miseries which then surrounded him, and took refuge in the study of Oriental literature. The result is given in his "West-Eastern Divan."

Sakontala.

Goethe on Optimism.

Judaism and Christianity.

Were I a younger man, and did I fancy myself competent to the task, I would collect and translate all that Goethe has written on Judaism and Christianity. It should be published without note or comment,—for it is unlike anything I have ever met with from believer or unbeliever, and is absolutely unique. In one of his private letters to Lavater he makes a distinction, for which our ordinary language has no equivalent. He says, "I am by no means anti-christian, not even un-christian, but I am indeed nicht-christian." The difference between un-christian and nicht-christian may be conceived.

Goethe on the students' quarrel with the authorities.

It was at no great distance from this time that I called on Goethe to see whether I could induce him to act as a mediator between the Duke and the students in the quarrel that threatened an Auszug, or withdrawal, of the best young men of the University. Having listened to my representations, he coolly said, "So is it in these matters of police, in which both parties are right. The students, seeing the matter from their point of view, are perfectly in the right. But then the Duke is equally in the right; he has his own mode of looking at things from his point of view as sovereign."

CHAP. VIII. — 1804.

Goethe's wife.

During these occasional visits, I saw the companion of Goethe's table, the mother of his children. As is well known, she afterwards became his wife. She had an agreeable countenance, and a cordial tone. Her manners were unceremonious and free. Queer stories are told of her undignified ways and the freedom of her intercourse with him when she was young; but she had outgrown all such eccentricities when I saw her.

Goethe's son's album.

I have already referred to Goethe's son coming to Madame de Staël with his album. She allowed me to copy the two first verses of the little volume. I have never seen them in print.

In Goethe's hand were these distichs—

> " Gönnern reiche das Buch, und reich' es Freund und Gespielen;
> Reich' es dem Eilenden hin, der sich vorüber bewegt—
> Wer des freundlichen Worts, des Namens Gabe dir spendet > Häufet den edlen Schatz holden Erinnerns dir an."

That is:

> " Hand to the Patron the book, and hand it to friend and companion;
> Hand to the traveller too—rapidly passing away:
> He who with friendly gift of a word or a name thee enriches,"

[The last line is wanting in the translation. The meaning is,— > "Stores up a noble treasure of tender remembrance for thee."]

In Schiller's hand were these lines—

> " Holder Knab', dich liebt das Glück denn es gab dir der Güter, > Erstes, Köstliches, dich rühmend des Vaters zu freuen
> Jetzo kennest du nur des Freundes liebende Seele.
> Wenn du zum Manne gereift, wirst du die Worte verstehen.
> Dann erst kehrst du zurück mit reiner Liebe Gefühle
> An des Trefflichen Brust der dir jetzt Vater nur ist;

Lass ihn leben in dir, wie er lebt in den ewigen Werken,
Die er, der Einzige, uns blühend unsterblich erschuf,
Und das herzliche Band der wechselnden Neigung und Treue Das die Väter verknüpft, binde die Söhne nur fort."

"Cherished boy! thou art the favourite of Fortune, for she gave thee the first and most precious of gifts, to rejoice in the glory of thy father. Now thou knowest only the loving heart of the friend. When thou art ripened into manhood thou wilt understand the words. Thou wilt then go back with feelings of pure love to the bosom of the excellent who at present is merely father to thee. Let him live in thee, as he lives in the eternal works which he, the only one, produced for us in everlasting bloom; and may the heartfelt bond of reciprocal inclination and confidence, which united the fathers, continue to unite the sons!"

Voigt, junior.

The son of Prorector Voigt was among the students with whom I became most intimate. Later in life he became Professor of Botany at Jena, and acquired reputation by his writings. Of the kindliness of his disposition I have a deep sense; our friendship has retained its original warmth for forty years, and during that time there has been no interruption to our correspondence. At the time of which I am now writing he had completed his studies, and settled at Gotha with the object of practising as a physician; and there I paid him a visit. An Englishman was then a phenomenon in the little town, but I was cordially received in Voigt's circle of acquaintance; and I recollect that when I had danced with a lady and handed her to a seat, she somewhat surprised me by saying, "And now, sir, I have to tell you that you are the last gentleman I shall ever dance with in company."—"Indeed, madam! How is that?"—"Why, sir, to-morrow my daughter is to be confirmed, and I have always been of opinion that when a lady is so far advanced in life as to have a daughter confirmed, it is time to give up dancing."

Chap. viii. 1804.

But my object in referring to this visit to Gotha is to say something of a man whose name belongs to the history of the last century, though it was raised to undue importance by the malignant exaggerations of party spirit.

The Illuminati.

During the heat of the first Revolution in France, two works appeared, one in England, by Professor Robison of Edinburgh, and the other, the more voluminous, in France, by the Abbé Barruel, with the common object of showing that the Revolution and all the horrors consequent on it were the effect of a conspiracy deliberately planned and carried out on the Continent of Europe by an Order of Infidels, who, by means of secret societies, planned to destroy all thrones, overturn all altars, and completely upset the established order of things. The society to which this scheme was ascribed had the name of The Illuminati. They were supposed to have ramifications everywhere. The Kantian philosophy was one of the instruments. Indeed, more or less, every union of men, and every variety of thought, opposed to monarchy and popery had about it the suspicion of "Illumination." And of this tremendous evil the founder and archdeacon was Adam Weishaupt. When I found that this notorious man was leading a secluded life in Gotha, I determined to call on him. On entering his room, I remarked that he was both embarrassed and reserved, and it was not till I had introduced myself as one anxious to see him, though I knew of him only from his enemies, that he seemed willing to enter into conversation with me. On my taking leave, he even invited me to repeat my visit, and I went to him three times. He frankly told me that I was let into his house through the stupidity of a servant girl, whom he was on the point of turning away for it; but he had forgiven her on account of the pleasure he had derived from our interviews. He said he held in abhorrence all travellers who made impertinent calls, and especially Englishmen. He would not gratify the curiosity of such men. But my candour and openness had rendered him willing to make an exception in my case. In saying this he was, perhaps, not departing from that character which his enemies ascribed to him. Indeed, as is usual in such instances, the statements made concerning him are founded in truth. The falsehood lies in the exaggeration of some parts of his history, and in the omission of others.

Adam Weishaupt.

Adam Weishaupt.

Weishaupt would not have denied that he was brought up among the Jesuits, or that in his opposition to them he availed himself of the resources which he acquired through his connection with them. And he did form a secret Order at a time when, especially in the South of Germany, an open expression of free opinions would have endangered liberty, and perhaps life. That the end was good according to his first intention, and that there was at all times, perhaps, a mixture of goodness in his motives, may reasonably be conceded. Many eminent men (Baron Knigge was one of the ablest) attached themselves to the Order. It has always been said that Maximilian, the first king of Bavaria, was favourable to it; nor does the history of his reign contradict the report. The Church, the courtiers, and the aristocracy were, however, too powerful for the conspirators. The society was broken up, a fierce persecution arose, and Weishaupt was happy in making his escape, and obtaining the protection of the learned Duke of Saxe-Gotha and the Duchess. When I saw him he was about fifty-six years of age, and his appearance was in no respect prepossessing; his features were coarse, his voice harsh, and his manners abrupt and awkward. But his conversation made a strong impression on my mind. He showed no great anxiety to vindicate himself against the prevailing opinion respecting him, or to dwell on those sentiments which would be most likely to gain popular favour; on the contrary, he uttered things which it requires boldness and indifference to evil report to express. Among his sayings, one was delivered with peculiar emphasis: "One of my tests of character is what a man says about principle. A weak man is always talking of acting on principle. An able man does always the right thing at the right moment, and therein he shows himself to be able." He even went so far as to say that there are occasions when it is foolish to be just. He took a desponding view of human life, and seemed to think human society unimprovable. No wonder! He had himself failed as a reformer, and therefore thought no one else could succeed. He said, "There is but one schoolmaster whose teaching is always effectual—Necessity. Evil flourishes till it destroys itself. So it was with Popery; so it will be with monarchy." And he added, somewhat diffusely, that there is a constant interchange of progressive evil and partial reform. I said, I could not believe that his view was a correct one.

Chap. viii.
—
1804.

Adam Weishaupt.

He smiled and said, "You are quite right; if you can help it, don't believe it." I said, "You would not teach this to your children."—"If I attempted it," he answered, "I should not succeed. The young, with their good hearts, cannot believe it."—"But old men with cold heads?" I said in a voice of interrogation.—"I am sorry for it," he said, "but it is true."

Chap. VIII. — 1804.

Weishaupt's writings.

The practical writings of Weishaupt are of value; the speculative were never esteemed. He wrote against the Kantian philosophy, but his works were not read. His "Pythagoras," as he said, contains all the statistics of Secret Societies. But the vast extension of education since Weishaupt's time has rendered this learning of less importance than it was even then. He is said to have been an admirer of Buonaparte. This is natural with his peculiar habit of thought. For the French character he professed great contempt, and for the English high admiration. To poetry and the fine arts he was indifferent.

Students.

At the Easter recess of 1804, the students who had threatened to leave the University, unless the demands in their memorial were complied with, took their departure to pursue their studies elsewhere. Jena seemed deserted; I at least lost the greater number of my younger friends and companions. A large proportion of them repaired to the recently established University of Würzburg.

Major von Knebel.

It happened, fortunately for myself, that, soon after this loss, I became intimate with one for whom, of all my German acquaintance, I have felt the warmest regard: this was Major von Knebel. He was at the time

CHAP. VIII. — 1804.

Major von Knebel.

just sixty years of age. He had a fine military figure, and his temper and character were much better adapted to arms than to scholarship; yet his tastes were literary. A Franconian nobleman by birth, he entered early into the service of Prussia, and was brought up under the great Frederick. But the restraints and subordination of a military life were repugnant to him. He loved poetry intensely, and even wrote verses. On a journey which he accidentally made through Weimar, when under the government of the Duchess-Dowager Amelia, he had the good fortune to make himself acceptable to the Duchess Regent. She obtained from the King of Prussia his discharge from military duties, and he accepted office in the Court of Weimar as governor of the Prince Constantine, the second son, and became his travelling companion in France. This was just at that genial period when Goethe became, not precisely the governor, but the intimate companion of the heir and subsequent Duke of Saxe-Weimar, who when I was at Weimar was the sovereign.

Knebel, therefore, was a participator in all those acts of extravagance of which public report was so full, and which have formed a subject for so much political and literary gossip. When his pupil died, which was in a few years, he had a pension allowed him, with the rank and emoluments of a Major; and thus he was sufficiently provided for till the end of his days. He was without the early training of the scholar, and the habits of the literary man; but he had the tastes of a delicate organization, and all the feelings of a man of honour and refined sensibility, with a choleric temperament. His sense of honour rendered him very reserved on all matters connected with the Court, especially with the Duke and Goethe. That sense of honour at the same time also kept him aloof from the Court. While he shared the admiration which was universally felt towards Goethe, there was something which prevented the perfect feeling of cordiality which existed between Herder and himself. In that division of literary men at Weimar, which placed Goethe and Schiller at the head of one set, and Wieland and Herder at the head of the other, there could be no question as to which Knebel attached himself.

The Court at Weimar.

His own taste led him to occupy himself with translations. He published a German version of the "Elegies of Propertius," and devoted many years of his life to the production of a German Lucretius. In the course of his studies he had formed a high opinion of the critical taste of Gilbert Wakefield, whose text he adopted; and it added not a little to my merit in his eyes, that I had known Wakefield. Elegiac tenderness and sententious wisdom were the directions which his faculty of verse-making took. He was a moral poet, and full of "natural piety," to borrow Bacon's expression.

Lucretius.

From the moment of my being known to Knebel, I became intimate in his house. There was none into which I went with so much pleasure, and Knebel seemed to receive no one with so much satisfaction. He had a great deal to learn from me in English literature, and I from him in German. Though our opportunities of intercourse lasted but a short time, I yet Intimacy with Knebel.

CHAP. VIII.
—
1804.

attached greater value to his acquaintance than any other I formed in Germany. He had not the means of giving expensive entertainments, nor was it the custom in Jena to give them; but he was by nature liberal and most gentlemanly in all his feelings. He was an object of universal love.

H. C. R. TO HIS BROTHER.*

Jena, Dec. 12th, 1804.

I met Knebel first at the house of Frau von Wollzogen, and was immediately invited to visit him. I am now the most intimate ami de la maison. If for three days I omit calling, the servant comes with the Major's compliments to inquire after my health; and I find that I am never unwelcome. We sometimes read Shakespeare, but oftener reason about Lucretius. By what lucky mistake I know not, but the Major looks on me as a Philolog, lays scruples and difficulties before me, and listens to me with an attention that makes me internally blush. He is chatty, has seen much of life and literary men, and relates his anecdotes with pleasure. Nor is this all. A few years since he married a very pretty and amiable woman, just half as old as himself. She is lively and naïve in the highest degree, so that they often seem rather in the relation of parent and child than of husband and wife. He has besides a forward clever boy of ten, with whom I can very well entertain myself. Thus it needs no assurance of mine that in this house I am quite happy; indeed it is my Knebel's family.

* This letter is given a little out of order as to time, but the reference in it to Knebel could come in nowhere else so well as here.

prime enjoyment this winter—a new tie to Jena. When persons of so excellent a character as Major Knebel attach themselves to me, I am always led to inquire into the cause, and that out of true modesty, for it seems a wonder to me. And in this case it lies more in the virtues of Knebel than in me. He loves the society of those to whom he can say everything. And my betters here are not of that description—real scholars have not time, and have too much pretention. I am a man of leisure. I am frank, and as I take liberties myself, so others can take liberties with me. And then the main point is, we ride one hobby-horse. I know no source of friendship so productive as this. I should further say that Major Knebel is in other respects a most worthy man—generous and sincere—a courtier without falsity—a soldier without frivolity. The worst fault I know in him is that he admires Buonaparte. I lately dined with him in company with the venerable Griesbach, whom you know as a theologian; and the equally venerable Wieland.

Reynard the Fox.

I will here mention an interesting anecdote connected with "Reynard the Fox," though it is already contained in my friend Naylor's translation of that work. One day, at Knebel's house, Herder said to Goethe, "Do you know that we have in the German language an epic poem with as much poetry in it as the 'Odyssey,' and more philosophy?"

When "Reineke Fuchs" was named, Goethe said he had been deterred from looking into it, by its being published by Gottsched, a sort of evil spirit who presided over the infant genius of German literature in the eighteenth century. Goethe, however, took the book away with him on a visit to Carlsbad, where he frequently passed the summer; and in a few weeks he wrote to Herder that his version of "Reineke" in hexameters was in the press.

Visit to Würzburg.

To soften the painful effect of taking leave at once of a number of high-spirited and generous young men, I had promised to pay a visit to Würzburg. On two points, moreover, my curiosity was not a little excited; first, as to how the Deism of Paulus would amalgamate with the Romanism of the Bavarian aborigines; and secondly, whether the peculiar character of a Jenaer-Bursche was fixed to the soil, or might be transplanted by so numerous a colony to the Maximilian school.

At the request of my new friend Knebel, I postponed my journey from the 8th to the 10th of September, in order to accompany his friend, Herr von Holzschuher. He was a patrician of the imperial city of Nuremberg, and I found him a most amiable and obliging man. His station and exterior figure did not seem promising for a long expedition on foot; but, notwithstanding his shrivelled, swarthy face, slender limbs, and shuffling gait, he had an inborn nobility of legs that secured my esteem, and enabled him to accomplish from twelve to fourteen leagues a day during the short time we were together.

Students' trick on a landlord.

My reception at Würzburg was a very cordial one, and I found myself an object of interest to many former Jena students, who crowded round me to hear tidings of a place they loved more than their pride would allow them to confess. When I repaired to my inn, my companions, bent on fun, urged me to be the chief actor in playing off a trick on a foolish landlord. Indeed, without preparing me for what they were going to do, they introduced me to him at once as the illustrious philosopher Fichte. The man was so egregious a simpleton, that the task on my part was an easy one. My companions gravely put to me questions of casuistry, which I answered sometimes with Delphic mysticism, i.e. sheer nonsense, at others with pompous triteness—a still more successful method, perhaps, of befooling a fool. Our host was delighted to have his house honoured by the presence of so great a man, and soon brought into the room a witness and sharer of his felicity, a young Catholic priest on his way to the Arch-chancellor, the Elector Dalberg. After my friends had left me, and when I was quite alone, this young priest came to me for the second time, and begged to have the honour of a few words in private with the great man. I thought I might innocently indemnify myself for my trouble by learning some of his sentiments. "Pray," said I, "now that the young people are away, let us talk openly. Men of our character understand each other. How is it that a person of your philosophic turn of mind can submit to the slavery of the Roman Catholic system? How do you dare to think philosophy?" He assumed a look that Hogarth might have borrowed, and said, "To tell you the truth, Herr Professor, there is not one of us who does not feel the yoke, and we envy you Protestants; but we are poor, and submit for the sake of a maintenance. But I

H. C. R. as Fichte.

CHAP. VIII.
—
1804.

assure you we are more enlightened than you are aware of." And then he said, with a smile of conceit, "Perhaps, after all, we do not believe so much even as you. In secret we are very enlightened." The style in which he went on prevented me from feeling any scruple at the joke to which I was a party. I have no doubt he was saying what he supposed would recommend him to my favourable opinion. I inquired about the disputes then going on between the King and the Bishop (of Würzburg), and found from his account, which now I could believe to be sincere, that he and his brethren were anxious to steer between the two powers; for to the one they owed their subsistence, and to the other their clerical character. The next morning, Professor Fichte paid his bill, and took up his abode with one of his friends.

Execution of a criminal.

In the course of the day I beheld a strange sight—a man beheaded for murder. He was of the lowest description of character—sunk in brutal stupidity and despair. The spectator could not but feel ashamed of such a degradation of human nature. The place of execution in Germany is usually a circular elevation, spacious enough to hold a chair and three or four persons, i.e. some fifteen or twenty feet in diameter. In the present instance the criminal, having rapidly performed certain religious rites below, which I did not see, was blindfolded, and, with a crucifix in his hand, led by two men to the raised ground, and there placed in a chair. The executioner then stepped from behind, holding a broad sword under his cloak, and in an instant, with a back-handed blow, severed the head from the body.

The headless trunk remained in the chair unmoved, as if nothing had happened. A Capuchin monk then came forward and, lifting up a huge crucifix, exclaimed, "See, my friends,—that thing which was a man sits there, and all because he neglected going to confession." A Protestant in like circumstances would have ascribed the catastrophe to the violation of the Sabbath. The address which followed was delivered with eloquence, and, though disgusting to me, was, I felt, well adapted to impress the sort of audience collected to hear it.

Paulus.

I spent two days visiting various acquaintances, and both days I had great pleasure in dining with Professor Paulus, an agreeable companion, very acute as well as clear-headed. Whatever opinion I may entertain of his Christianity—which is not so favourable now as it was then—I see no reason to withhold the acknowledgment of his perfect sincerity and integrity. He claimed the character of a Christian Professor, and this during his long academical life was not denied him by any official colleague, though refused to him by controversial adversaries. I learned from him that Schelling had already lost the favour of the Government, and that a struggle of parties was going on which threatened (and soon produced its effect on) the infant University.*

* It should be not infant, but rejuvenescent. The University of Würzburg was originally established in 1403, but, having ceased to exist, was re-established in 1582; and an attempt was made at the beginning of the present century to widen its influence by the appointment of several very eminent professors; and it seems that a Protestant element was introduced in the theological staff of professors. At the present time Würzburg is a Roman Catholic university. The Protestant university of Bavaria is that of Erlangen, at which a large proportion of the students are theological.

Chap. viii. — 1804. The Bergstrasse.

The hope of being able to render service to a friend caused me to extend my tour to Heidelberg and Carlsruhe. Of the former I need not speak; the latter did not please me. The town is built in the shape of a fan, the palace forming the handle, and the streets radiating from it. Of the famous Bergstrasse I will only say, that I never felt more strongly the effect of scenery in giving strength and resolution. It is said that a property of beauty is to enervate; but this was not my experience in the present journey. The road was lined on both sides with fruit-trees of every description, especially walnuts, apples, and chestnuts. The principal harvest was over, but every variety of produce was left, including, besides more familiar objects, flax, tobacco, and Indian corn. I noticed one peach-tree standing by itself. The apples were not knocked down, but carefully gathered one by one by means of an instrument combining a rake and a basket.

Buonaparte.

While I was on this little tour Buonaparte paid a visit to Mayence, of which all the papers were full. I was amused at the prevailing timidity of the people in expressing their opinions. I never met with an individual who had a word to say in his favour, but no one ventured to speak against him. I alone talked freely, and I could see that people envied me my power of saying what I liked. One evening, at the table-d'hôte, I was rattling away as usual, when a well-looking man who sat next me asked where I was going? I said, "On foot to Frankfort." He took me by the hand, and in the tone of one about to ask a serious favour, begged me to take a seat between him and his wife in their carriage. "It will do my heart good," he said, "to talk with an Englishman about that vile people and their vile Emperor, who have thrust my nation into such misery. I am from Berne; my name is Von Haller."—"Probably of the family of the great physiologist?" I said.—"The same." The request was seconded by his very nice little wife, who had hardly ever before been out of her native place. I enjoyed my drive with my patriotic companions, and the first day after our arrival at Frankfort I devoted to them. I then spent four days in calling on my several acquaintance. But my visit was tantalizing rather than satisfying, and led to a reflection which on other occasions has forced itself on me, and which I think worth writing here. It is this,—the sentiments we entertain for old friends are sometimes endangered by a short visit after a few years' absence. The recollection of the former intercourse with old friends has about it a charm, which is broken when they are seen for only a short time. If there be a second stay with them sufficiently lengthened to form a new image, then a double and strengthened attachment arises. Otherwise an illusion is destroyed, and no substitute is produced.

Von Haller.

In my notes of the Brentano family, I find that Bettina pleased me this time better than before. Now I may venture to mention Bettina, who has since gained a European notoriety at least. When I first came to Frankfort she was a short, stout, romping girl, the youngest and least agreeable of Madame de la Roche's grandchildren. She was always considered a wayward, unmanageable creature. I recollect seeing her climb Bettina.

CHAP. VIII. — 1804.

apple-trees, and she was a great rattling talker. I recollect also hearing her speak in terms of extravagant admiration of the Mignon of Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister." Clasping her hands over her bosom, she said, "I always lie thus when in bed, in imitation of Mignon." I had heard nothing of her for many years, when there appeared "Goethes Briefwechsel mit einem Kinde" (Correspondence of Goethe with a Child). In this book Bettina wishes to have it thought that she was so much an object of interest to Goethe, that he framed sonnets out of her letters. My friend Fritz Schlosser says he is most certain that these letters were not written at the date they bear, but are mere inventions founded on the sonnets. My acquaintance at Frankfort are of the same opinion, and it is not opposed by the family.

Goethes Briefwechsel mit einem Kinde.

On the way back to Jena I passed through Fulda, the residence of a prince-bishop, and saw a play entitled "Üble Laune," by Kotzebue. I thought it did not justify the epigram made upon it by A. W. Schlegel:—

> "Justly and wisely this piece by the author's entitled 'Ill Humour;'
> Though in the play 'tis not found, still by the play 'tis engender'd."

Salzmann.

I visited one Salzmann, a famous practical pedagogue, who has established a large and distinguished seminary at Schnepfenthal.* This Salzmann has made himself generally known by the very elaborate and solicitous attention he pays to the gymnastical part of education, by the anti-disciplinarian principles, and by the universal tendency and direction of the studies.

* A village near Waltershausen, in the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

I saw that the boys were healthy, happy, and courageous. And Salzmann seemed to have succeeded in the difficult task (which the French have found impracticable) of giving liberty and repressing licentiousness. The boys are on no occasions struck—this is a fundamental law. Another is to give them freedom in everything not obviously dangerous. They botanize and study natural history, and take long journeys with their preceptors on foot over the mountains. They climb trees, jump over hedges, swim, skate, &c. &c., and, as far as general culture of the active powers is concerned, there is much to be applauded, but I fear solid learning is neglected, and the institution is not without affectation, and even what looks like quackery. A newspaper is printed here containing a history of all remarkable occurrences, prizes given, incidents in the house, exercises performed, visits of strangers, &c. With edifying improvements, Salzmann translated Mary Wollstonecraft's "Rights of Women," and he was in correspondence with her. One of her children's books is a translation of a work by him.

Schoolboys at Schnepfenthal.

After my return, Knebel was anxious to take me to Weimar to see his sister, governess to the Hereditary Princess, and also Fraülein von Geckhausen, the Hofdame to the Duchess Dowager. We went on the 27th of October. I had the honour of sipping chocolate in the presence of the young Princess. I also visited Frau von Wollzogen, Schiller's wife's sister, afterwards his biographer, and I witnessed the performance of "Turandot."* This fairy tale, by Schiller, an imitation of Gozzi, is not considered one of his great works; but it proved versatility of talent, and afforded an opportunity of trying an experiment. It was played with masks, and certainly gave pleasure as soon as the spectators were reconciled to the novelty. At each performance, for some time, the interest was enhanced by the introduction of fresh riddles, by which the Chinese Princess tried the skill of her unwelcome lover.

* Turandot, Prinzessin von China. Ein tragikomisches Mährchen nach Gozzi.

Chap. viii. — 1804.

Affair in Lecture Room.

On the 24th of November, an occurrence took place which at one time threatened me with serious consequences, but which eventually was of service to me by occasioning my introduction to the Duchess. Of all the Jena professors, the most unpopular was E——. He had the ear of the Grand Duke, but was disliked both by his colleagues and the students. He lectured this session on Homer and the Roman satirists. One of the students had put into my hands a commentary on Horace, from which we saw that the Professor read page after page. As soon as the lecture was over, and E—— had left the room, I called out to the students, "Gentlemen, I will read you the lecture over again," and began reading; I was a little too soon, E—— was within hearing, and rushed back to the room. An altercation ensued, and I was cited before the Prorector. It was reported that I should be sent away, that is, receive the consilium abeundi. My friend Knebel took up my cause zealously. The Prorector interrogated me, and I related to him all that I could. In the Senate, my chief friend was the great jurist Thibaut, who, next to Savigny, was one of the great law authorities of the day in Germany. I soon learned that E—— had succeeded in misrepresenting the affair; and from Thibaut I received the advice to draw up a formal statement, and present it to the Prorector, with the request that he would lay it before the Senate. This I did; and I added a letter from a student corroborating every important fact, especially the fact that E—— had merely read from Haverkamp. The Senate requested the Professor to send in his answer. Thibaut said that for his own part he would never consent to my receiving the consilium,—for either I ought to be expelled with infamy as a liar, or I had told the truth, and then the less said about the matter the better. It was discovered that E—— was gone to Weimar, with the object it was believed of obtaining a Ducal order for my removal; therefore my friends resolved to introduce me to the Grand Duchess.

The Prorector affected to be my friend, and said the matter should be made up by the merely nominal punishment of a rustication for two days. I said I should submit to no punishment. If there were a sentence against me, I should appeal to the Duke; and if that did not avail, I should leave the University, and send a printed copy of my statement to all the other Universities. In my paper, I stated that if I were accused of making a false charge of plagiarism, I pledged myself to prove the charge. The Professor never answered my memorial; and so the matter ended.

The Dowager Duchess Amelia.

In the meanwhile, however, it took me to Weimar. The Dowager Duchess Amelia, a niece of Frederick, King of Prussia, was a very superior woman; and German literature is under infinite obligations to her. She was the especial patroness of Wieland and Herder, but was honoured by Goethe, Schiller, and indeed by every one. The first day I dined with her I felt as much at my ease as the last. Wieland was always at her table. On the present occasion she desired me to be at the theatre in Schiller's box. I called on him, and went with his party. The Duchess came, and stood next me, and chatted with me. E—— was in the pit, and it was supposed the sight of me must have taken away his last hope of success. At all events, all apprehension on my account was removed early in the new year by my public appearance under the Duchess Dowager's protection.

Chap. viii. — 1804.

H. C. R. to his Brother.

March 2nd, 1805.

The Duchess is certainly one of the most estimable of the German princesses, and is not unworthy of being a niece of Frederick II. At the theatre I saw the wonder of the North, and the object of every one's idolatry here—the hereditary Princess of Saxe-Weimar. As my residence here has given you an interest in everything that concerns our little court, I take for granted that you are not ignorant that a few months since our Hereditary Prince brought home his bride—the sister of the Emperor of Russia, and a daughter of Paul. All tongues are lavish of her praise, and indeed she seems to be really an extraordinary person. She is young, and possesses a most cultivated mind and accomplished address. I stood by her some time, and smiled at myself at remarking the effect she had on me—since, excellent as I doubt not she is, I am still sensible that the strange sensation I felt at hearing her say common things was principally occasioned by the magic of title and name.

Princess of Saxe-Weimar.

CHAP. VIII.
1805.

Chap. ix.
—
1805.

CHAPTER IX.

Germany.—1805.

In 1805 Jena was to sustain a fresh loss in the departure of Voss, to whom a pension of 1,000 dollars a year was offered on the simple condition of his living at Heidelberg. On the other hand, there came to live at Weimar Mr. and Mrs. Hare Naylor, whom I found a very valuable addition to my circle of acquaintance. He was the son of the Whig Bishop Hare, and she the daughter of Bishop Shipley, brother of the patriotic Dean of St. Asaph, whom Erskine defended in the prosecution for publishing Sir W. Jones's famous Dialogue. The Hare Naylors had young children, of whom, at the time I am writing, the Archdeacon Julius is the only survivor. Miss Flaxman lived with them as governess.*

Mr. and Mrs. Hare Naylor.

Miss Flaxman.

I have now to mention an event which cast its shadow far and wide, but especially over the neighbourhood of Weimar—the death of Schiller.

The death of Schiller.

It has frequently been to me a subject of regret that during my residence at Jena I did not take more pains to be received into the society of the great poets of Weimar. I saw Schiller occasionally, as well as the others; but I did not push myself into their notice.

* Vide Memoir of Julius Hare prefixed to the last edition of "Guesses at Truth." The property of Hurstmonceux came into the Naylor family in 1701, and was sold by Francis Hare Naylor in 1807. The name Naylor therefore was doubtless assumed by Francis Hare in order to inherit this property.

This indeed I cannot regret. The only conversation I recollect having had with Schiller arose from my asking whether he did not know English, as I saw German translations of Shakespeare among his books. He said, "I have read Shakespeare in English, but on principle not much. My business in life is to write German, and I am convinced that a person cannot read much in foreign languages without losing that delicate tact in the perception of the power of words which is essential to good writing." I also asked him whether he was acquainted with Lillo. He said he began a play founded on the story of "George Barnwell." He thought highly of Lillo's dramatic talent. I told him the story of "Fatal Curiosity," which he thought a good subject. By the bye, Werner after this wrote a mystical play with the same plot, and called it "The 24th of February," on which day, for several generations, horrible events take place in a doomed family.

Foreign Languages.

Lillo.

During all the time I was at Jena, Schiller was in poor health, though at this time his greatest works were produced. He lived in a very retired way; and his habit was to write at midnight, taking a great deal of coffee as a stimulant. The report of his being in a dangerous state had already been spread abroad. Friday, the 10th of May, was Fries's last day at Jena, and as usual I went with him and others to take after-dinner coffee at Zwätzen. I left the party early, to keep an engagement to drink tea with Knebel at Fahrenkrüger's. While I was there some one came in with the news—"Schiller ist todt." Knebel sprang up, and in a loud voice exclaimed, whilst he struck the table vio-

Death of Schiller.

CHAP. IX.

1805.

Major von Knebel.

lently, "Der Tod ist der einzige dumme Jung." It was ridiculous and pathetic. Dear Knebel's passions were always an odd combination of fury and tenderness. He loved Schiller, and gave to his feelings immediate and unconsidered expression. He had no other word for them now than the comic student word of offence, the prelude to a duel, "Death is the only fool." I had engaged to go to a party in honour of Fries, and I went. We stayed up late, student-songs were sung, but we could not be glad; for there was not one of us who did not grieve for the loss of Schiller, though perhaps no one was intimate with him.

Party at Weimar.

I went next day to Weimar, where I remained till the 14th. I spent the Saturday in various company, for I had now many acquaintances. Schiller's death and character were the sole subjects of conversation. At a party at Fräulein Geckhausen's I was involved in a foolish squabble. I said unguardedly, "The glory of Weimar is rapidly passing away." One of the Kammerherrn (gentlemen of the chamber), was offended. "All the poets might die," he said angrily, "but the court of Weimar would still remain." The ladies took my part; they said, truly, that I was of course referring to no court glory. I was alluding to that in which Weimar threw into the shade Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Vienna.

Schiller's Funeral.

The interment of Schiller took place by night. Voss came from Jena to be one of the bearers. It rained: I was depressed, and as there was to be no address or ceremony, I did not attend. This I have since regretted.

Next day I dined quietly with Mrs. Hare. No one was with her but Miss Flaxman. I found Mrs. Hare's conversation very interesting. She had known Priestley; and lent me the life of her brother-in-law, Sir W. Jones, of her connection with whom she was proud.

Wieland on Schiller's Poetry.

On the 13th I dined with the Duchess Dowager. Wieland was present, and spoke of Schiller's poetical character, remarking, with I believe perfect truth, that Schiller's excellence lay more in lyrical poetry than in dramatic. In reference to himself, Wieland said he was a precocious child. At four years of age he began Latin; at eight understood Cornelius Nepos as well as if he had written it; and at fourteen was well acquainted with Horace.

Distich by Goethe.

One little incident I must not forget. The Grand Duchess showed me a copy of Goethe's quarto volume, "Winckelmann und sein Jahrhundert," which she had just received from him. On taking it into my hand, there fell from it a slip of paper, on which was written a distich. I never felt so strong a temptation to commit a theft. But I brought away a copy of the lines, without stealing:—

> "Freundlich empfange das Wort laut ausgesprochner Verehrung, > Das die Parze mir fast schnitt von den Lippen hinweg."
>
> ["Kindly receive the expression of loudly avowed veneration, > Though from before my lips Fate nearly snatched it away."]

That Goethe's life was in danger when Schiller died is well known; and this distich shows that about this time his "Winckelmann" was written.

The Duchess.

On the 8th of June I dined with the Duchess for the fourth time, and found Wieland very communicative. He spoke of French literature, and I asked him to recommend some French novels. He said, of Count

Wieland.

Hamilton opera omnia. He praised even the tales of Crébillon—"Le Sopha," "Ah, quelle Conte," and "Mémoires d'un Homme de Qualité," and some works by Abbé Prévost. He spoke also of English literature, to which he confessed great obligations. I had mentioned that the first book I recollected having read was the "Pilgrim's Progress." "That delights me," he said, "for in that book I learned to read English. English literature had a great influence on me; and your Puritan writings particularly. The first book I attempted to write was an imitation of Mrs. Rowe's 'Letters from the Dead to the Living.'" This was one of the favourite books of my own dear mother. Wieland went on to say, "The next work I read was a large didactic poem on Grace. I said to myself, in future no one will speak of Lucretius. After this I became acquainted with the lighter English poetry. I made my 'Komische Erzählungen' in imitation of Prior. I was also fond of Gay." Wieland thought English literature had declined since the age of Queen Anne.

English literature.

On a later occasion I saw still more of Wieland. It was when Knebel took me to Tieffurth, the country residence of the Duchess. I rode with Wieland tête-à-tête to Tieffurth, from his own house; and he spoke of his own works with most interesting frankness. He considered his best work to be "Musarion." He had gone over it with Goethe line by line. He was sensible that the characteristic of his prose style is what the Greeks called στωμυλία,—not mere chatter, "Geschwätz," but an agreeable diffuseness.

Wieland's Musarion.

At dinner I told him of the new publication of Gleim's Letters, and quoted a passage written by Gleim in Switzerland when Wieland, a mere lad, was staying at the house of Bodmer: "There is a very clever young man here now named Wieland—a great talker, and a great writer. It is a pity that, as one can see, he will very soon have exhausted himself." "Ich erschöpft!" ("I exhausted") Wieland cried out, clasping his hands. "Well, well! I am now in my seventy-fourth year (or seventy-third), and, by the blessing of God, I will still write more than he ever did, and it shall last longer too." This he said of the poet of Frederick the Great, whom the last generation used to regard as a Horace, and still more as a Tyrtæus.

Wieland.

After dinner I read aloud, among other things, a good translation by Schmidt of "Auld Robin Gray," which was much admired. Wieland told us to-day of his early attachment to Madame de la Roche. He said, "It was well it came to nothing, for we should have spoiled each other."

Humboldt and Napoleon.

Humboldt, the great traveller, on his return from America, was presented to the Emperor Napoleon. Now, Humboldt himself is a sort of Buonaparte among travellers, and expected to be distinguished. "Vous aimez la botanique," said the Emperor to him, "et ma femme aussi;" and passed on. Is it not admirable? There are many occurrences of great and little moment in life which can only be understood from their relation to the character of the actor. Was this address of Buonaparte humour, or satire, or insolence, or impertinence? Did he deserve a kick or a pat? Ask his lord in waiting.

Chap. ix.
1805.
Frau von Einsiedel.

At the close of my residence in Jena I became rather intimate with a woman whose history is very remarkable, especially as given by herself in detail. This was Frau von Einsiedel. Compelled to marry against her will, she found her husband so unfit for a woman to live with, that she feigned death, and, making her escape, caused a log of wood to be buried in her stead. When the truth was discovered, a legal divorce took place, and she became the wife of Herr von Einsiedel, who had been the companion of her flight. She gave me an account of her strange adventures, that I might not despise her in the distant country to which I was about to return. All she said was in language the most delicate, and was indicative of the most refined sensibility. She was held in high esteem by Knebel and Wieland, and retained the regard of the Duchess Dowager. I saw her repeatedly with the Duchess when she came to Jena, and took up her residence at the castle, in order to attend a course of lectures on Craniology by Dr. Gall.

Craniology.

This science of Craniology, which keeps its place in the world, though not among the universally received sciences, was then quite new. One or two pamphlets had appeared, but the gloss of novelty was still upon it. Goethe deemed it worthy of investigation, and, when a satire upon it was put into the form of a drama, would not allow it to be acted. The Duchess, who had a very active mind and a universal curiosity, took a warm interest in the lectures, and was unremitting in her attendance at them.

Gall.

Gall, whom the Duchess invited me to meet at dinner, was a large man with a florid countenance,—of the same general complexion as Astley Cooper and Chantrey. He had not been brought up in cultivated society; and so utterly wanting in tact was he, that, on one occasion, having enumerated the different organs on a marked skull, he turned to the Duchess and regularly catechised her as if she had been an ordinary student. "What's the name of that organ, your Highness?" She gave me a very significant look, and smiled: there was a titter round the table, and the Professor looked abashed. Gall was attended by Spurzheim, as his famulus, who received our fee for the lectures.

Compilation on Craniology, by H. C. R.

It occurred to me that I might make this new science known in England, and accordingly I purchased of Spurzheim, for two Friedrichs d'or, a skull marked with the organs. I bought also two pamphlets, one by Hufeland, and the other by Bischof, explanatory of the system. And soon after my return to London I compiled on the subject a small volume, which was published by Longman.* The best part of the book was a happy motto from Sir Thomas Brown, for which I take credit: "The finger of God hath left an inscription upon all his works, not graphical or composed of letters, but of their several forms, constitutions, parts, and operations, which, aptly joined together, do make one word that doth express their nature." The work itself excited hardly any public interest; but just at the time a new and enlarged edition of Rees's Cyclopædia was coming out, and the whole substance of the article on Craniology was copied from my work, the source being suitably acknowledged.

* Some Account of Dr. Gall's New Theory of Physiognomy, founded on the Anatomy and Physiology of the Brain, and the Form of the Skull. With the Critical Strictures of C. W. Hufeland, M.D. London, Longman & Co., 1807.

CHAP. IX.
1805.

Review of Studies.

My student life was rapidly drawing to a close—or perhaps I should say rather my life at Jena—for I must confess I owe more to the society I enjoyed there than to what I learned in the lecture-rooms of the professors. My memoranda of my reading in Greek and Latin are to me a source of mingled shame and consolation—consolation that I did not wholly neglect the great authors of antiquity, and shame that so little of what I read remains. To German literature and philosophy I continued also to devote a part of my time. But latterly I attended fewer lectures, and read more with friends and private tutors.

Wieland.

On the 8th of August, 1805, I went to Weimar to take leave. The Duchess was exceedingly kind, as also was Wieland. When I called on him he was writing, and I apologized for the interruption. "I am only copying," he said. On my expressing some surprise that he had not an amanuensis, he said, "I believe I have spent one-sixth part of my life in copying, and I have no doubt it has had a salutary effect on me. Having devoted myself to the composition of works of imagination, copying has had a sedative and soothing influence, and tended to keep my mind in a healthy state." He was then copying one of the comedies of Aristophanes. He said he meant to translate all but two, which he deemed untranslatable. One was "Peace;" the title of the other I forget.

Leaving Jena.

On the 15th of August I left Jena. It was my good fortune to come to Jena while the ancient spirit was still alive and active, and I saw the last not altogether insignificant remains of a knot of public teachers who have seldom been surpassed in any university. I have seen, too, a galaxy of literary talent and genius, which future ages will honour as the poetical ornament of the eighteenth century, and place above the more showy but less sterling beaux-esprits of France who flourished thirty or forty years before. Of my leave-taking at Jena I will only say that I parted with no one with so much regret as Knebel. My friend Voigt accompanied me three leagues. On the 21st I reached Brunswick, and on the 24th took my place in the Post-wagen to Hamburg. In this journey I had a narrow escape of being taken prisoner. I travelled with a passport, which I had procured as a Saxon. I was not without anxiety, for I had to pass through the French army, which was in possession of the north of Germany. Through the interposition of the King of Prussia, Hamburg had been declared neutral territory; but I at that time spoke German fluently, and did not fear detection by Frenchmen. A more wearisome journey than the one I had now to make cannot be found, certainly in Germany. One of the passengers was a Frenchman, who rendered himself disagreeable to all the rest. I afterwards found that he was even then in the French service. On the way he and I had two or three rather angry discussions in German. But I was not fully aware till afterwards of the peril I encountered in his company. I read occasionally, and as often as I could walked forward, wishing there had been hills to give me more opportunity of walking.

A narrow escape.

Chap. ix. 1805.

On one occasion I had gone on a considerable distance, when I came to a turnpike, the keeper of which had a countenance which struck me as remarkably like that of Erskine. Two soldiers were riding at a distance. I said to the man, "Who are they?"

"Gens-d'armes."

"What are they about?"

"Looking after suspicious characters."

"Do you mean people who have no passes?"

"Ay, and those who have passes—Englishmen who try to pass for Germans."

He laughed, and so did I. It was evident he had detected me, but I was in no danger from him. He said also, "Perhaps they are on the look-out for some one. They have their spies everywhere." This I own made me feel a little uncomfortable, and put me on my guard. In the evening, about six, the second day, we passed through Lüneburg, which was full of French soldiers. At length, about 1 A.M., we arrived at the Elbe, where the military were stationed whose duty it was to examine our passports. But it was too much trouble to rise from bed, and we were at once ferried over the river to the Hamburg side, where we were under Prussian protection. As soon as we were again in the carriage, and in motion, I felt unable to repress my feeling of triumph, and snapping my finger at the Frenchman, said, "Nun, Herr, ich bin ein Engländer" ("Now, sir, I am an Englishman"). He did not conceal his mortification, and said, "You ought to have been taken prisoner for your folly in running such a risk"—in which perhaps he was not far wrong. Had he discovered me a quarter of an hour before I should probably have been packed off to France, and kept prisoner till 1813. I was afterwards told by several of my fellow-passengers that they suspected me, and were apprehensive on my account.

Danger of being taken prisoner.

Chap. ix. — 1805.

Iffland.

At Hamburg I saw Iffland in the comedy entitled "Aussteuer,"—one of the most perfect pieces of acting I ever saw. His character was that of a low-minded Amtmann, an incarnation of apathy. I still recollect his look and voice. They were not to be forgotten. It is the one character in which he appeared most perfect, though I saw him in others of greater celebrity.

I remained at Hamburg but a short time, returning to England by the ordinary way.

The Battle of Austerlitz.

It was a critical moment. The very packet which took me over to England carried the news of the fatal battle of Austerlitz, which inflicted a deep wound on the already crippled power of Austria. This victory encouraged Buonaparte to fresh insults on Prussia, which soon led to a Prussian war. And as Prussia had looked on quietly, if not complacently, when the battle of Austerlitz was fought, so Austria beheld with a kind of resentful composure the victory gained by the French over the Prussians at Jena.

Voyage.

On our very disagreeable voyage we were not without fear of being attacked by a French privateer; but, on the 17th of September, we arrived safely at Yarmouth, and on the 19th I proceeded to Bury. I enjoyed the drive, the excellence of the roads, and the swiftness of the stage-coach; and the revival of home feelings delighted me. On the way I saw my father for a moment; and on arriving at Bury, between twelve and one at night, I ran down to my brother's house to see whether by accident any one of the family was still up. As this was not the case, I went back to the Greyhound to sleep. In my walk I was uncomfortably impressed with the lowness and smallness of the Bury houses. And now I will confess to having indulged myself in a little act of superstition. I had not heard of my brother for some months; and as a charm against any calamity to him or his family, I enumerated all possible misfortunes, with the feeling which I have had through life, that all calamities come unexpectedly; and so I tried to ensure a happy meeting by thinking of "all the ills that flesh is heir to."

Chap. ix.
—
1805.

Act of superstition.

CHAPTER X.

1805—1806.

AFTER my long absence in Germany, it was a great pleasure to see my English friends; and for some weeks I spent most of my time with them. To those who lived in the country I paid visits.

Mrs. Barbauld.

In December I formed a new acquaintance, of which I was reasonably proud, and in the recollection of which I still rejoice. At Hackney I saw repeatedly Miss Wakefield,* a charming girl. And one day at a party, when Mrs. Barbauld had been the subject of conversation, and I had spoken of her in enthusiastic terms, Miss Wakefield came to me and said, "Would you like to know Mrs. Barbauld?" I exclaimed, "You might as well ask me whether I should like to know the angel Gabriel."—"Mrs. Barbauld is, however, much more accessible. I will introduce you to her nephew." She then called to Charles Aikin, whom she soon after married. And he said, "I dine every Sunday with my uncle and aunt at Stoke Newington, and I am expected always to bring a friend with me. Two knives and forks are laid for me. Will you go with me next Sunday?" Gladly acceding to the proposal, I had the good fortune to make myself agreeable, and soon became intimate in the house.

* The daughter of Gilbert Wakefield.

Chap. x. — 1805—1806.

Mr. Barbauld.

Mr. Barbauld had a slim figure, a weazen face, and a shrill voice. He talked a great deal, and was fond of dwelling on controversial points in religion. He was by no means destitute of ability, though the afflictive disease was lurking in him, which in a few years broke out, and, as is well known, caused a sad termination to his life.

Mrs. Barbauld.

Mrs. Barbauld bore the remains of great personal beauty. She had a brilliant complexion, light hair, blue eyes, a small elegant figure, and her manners were very agreeable, with something of the generation then departing. She received me very kindly, spoke very civilly of my aunt Zachary Crabb, and said she had herself once slept at my father's house. Mrs. Barbauld is so well known by her prose writings that it is needless for me to attempt to characterize her here. Her excellence lay in the soundness and acuteness of her understanding, and in the perfection of her taste. In the estimation of Wordsworth she was the first of our literary women, and he was not bribed to this judgment by any especial congeniality of feeling, or by concurrence in speculative opinions. I may here relate an anecdote connecting her and Wordsworth, though out of its proper time by many, many years; but it is so good that it ought to be preserved from oblivion. It was after her death that Lucy Aikin published Mrs. Barbauld's collected works, of which I gave a copy to Miss Wordsworth. Among the poems is a stanza on Life, written in extreme old age. It had delighted my sister, to whom I repeated it on her deathbed. It was long after I gave these works to Miss Wordsworth that her brother said, "Repeat me that stanza by Mrs. Barbauld." I did so. He made me repeat it again. And so he learned it by heart. He was at the time walking in his sitting-room at Rydal with his hands behind him; and I heard him mutter to himself, "I am not in the habit of grudging people their good things, but I wish I had written those lines."

Wordsworth and Mrs. Barbauld.

CHAP. X. 1805—1806.

"Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather:
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear:
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime Bid me good morning."

J. D. Collier.

My friend Collier had taken up his residence in a small house in Little Smith Street, to the west of the Westminster School. A bedroom was offered me, and here I was glad to take refuge while I was equally without a home, and without an employment. The most important of his engagements—important also to me eventually—was that of reporter to the Times, under the management of John Walter, then the junior.*

When the round of my acquaintance had been run through, I set about finding some literary occupation, for I found myself unable to live with comfort on my small income, though with my economical habits I needed only a small addition.

1806. Engagement in translating.

My first engagement was to translate a political work against Buonaparte, for which a bookseller named Tipper, of Fenchurch Street, gave me a guinea and a half per sheet. My friend King Fordham thought some diplomatic post abroad would be suitable to me, and exerted himself in my behalf. C. J. Fox wrote that he thought it probable he should soon have occasion for the services of a person of my description. I went so far as to offer myself to Mr. Fox, but nothing came of it. And it is well, for I am not conscious of possessing the kind of talent required for the position of a diplomatist. Another thought was that I might be engaged as travelling companion to some young man. And there was at one time some prospect of my going to America in this capacity. George Dyer suggested my name to a gentleman, whose sons or nephews were desirous of visiting the New World; and I had several interviews with the celebrated American mechanist Fulton, who invented the Catenarian and Torpedo, and offered to Buonaparte to destroy the whole English fleet by means of explosives. Dining with him one day, I spoke of the "Perpetual Peace" of Kant. Fulton said, "I believe in the 'Perpetual Peace;'" and on my expressing surprise, he added, "I have no doubt war will be put an end to by being rendered so murderous that by common consent it will be abandoned. I could myself make a machine by means of which I could in a few minutes destroy a hundred thousand men." After some time I was informed that the visit to America was postponed, and I heard no more of it.*

* The father of the recent M.P. for Berkshire.

Chap. x. — 1806.

Fulton.

It was natural that, after having been away six years,

* At this time Mr. Robinson had in contemplation a work on Kant's Philosophy. Friends advised him not to translate any of Kant's works, but under some original form to introduce a considerable portion of translated matter. He accordingly proceeded so far as to fix on the following title: "Locke and Kant; or, a Review of the Philosophy of the Eighteenth Century as it respects the Origin and Extent of Human Knowledge, by H. C. R." But the work was never completed.

I should be curious to see the old Forum where I had formed the valuable acquaintance of the Colliers. They too were desirous that I should go. The old place, the "old familiar faces," were there. I have forgotten the question, but I spoke, and was surprised at the start I had taken. I went a second time, and it was, I believe, this evening that an incident occurred which gave me more pleasure than any other praise I ever received. The subject was private theatricals, which Gale Jones defended, and I successfully attacked. I say successfully, for the success was proved by something more significant than applause. As I left the room with Mrs. Collier, when it was nearly empty, a little old man was waiting about at the door with a fine young girl under his arm, and on my coming up he stretched out his hand, and in an agitated voice said, "Will you allow me, sir, to take you by the hand, and thank you for your speech to-night? You have made me a happy man, and I am under everlasting obligations to you." The poor girl coloured exceedingly, and I felt for her. I therefore contented myself with saying that I rejoiced if anything that had fallen from me could be thought by him eventually useful; and I believe I added, that I wished him to know I had spoken not for the sake of argument, but from my heart.

Debate on Private Theatricals.

In the following week I went to the Forum once more. On my walking up the centre of the room there was general clapping, at which I felt so unaffectedly ashamed, that I turned back, and never entered the place again.

On November 4th I saw "Coriolanus." It was a

Chap. x. — 1806.

John Kemble in Coriolanus.

glorious treat. I never saw Kemble so great. He played the aristocrat so admirably, and the democratic tribunes and the electors of Rome appeared so contemptible, that he drew down hisses on them. The house was crowded, and I was forced to stand.

In the month of December the Colliers removed from Little Smith Street to a good house in Hatton Garden, and I accompanied them.

Charles and Mary Lamb.

By this time I had become acquainted with Charles Lamb and his sister; for I went with them to the first performance of "Mr. H." at Covent Garden, which took place in the month of December. The prologue was very well received. Indeed it could not fail, being one of the very best in our language.

Farce of Mr. H.

But on the disclosure of the name, the squeamishness of the vulgar taste in the pit showed itself by hisses; and I recollect that Lamb joined, and was probably the loudest hisser in the house. The damning of this play belongs to the literary history of the day, as its author to the literary magnates of his age.*

I was introduced to the Lambs by Mrs. Clarkson. And I had heard of them also from W. Hazlitt, who was intimate with them. They were then living in a garret in Inner Temple Lane. In that humble apartment I spent many happy hours, and saw a greater number of excellent persons than I had ever seen collected together in one room. Talfourd, in his "Final Memorials," has happily characterized this circle.

* The farce of "Mr. H." was written by Lamb. Its absurdity turns on the hero being ashamed of his name, which is only revealed at the end as Hogsflesh.

CHAPTER XI.

ALTONA, SWEDEN, ETC. 1807.

Correspondent of the Times.

IN January 1807 I received, through my friend J. D. Collier, a proposal from Mr. Walter that I should take up my residence at Altona, and become the Times correspondent. I was to receive from the editor of the Hamburger Correspondenten all the public documents at his disposal, and was to have the benefit also of a mass of information of which the restraints of the German press did not permit him to avail himself. The honorarium I was to receive was ample with my habits of life. I gladly accepted the offer, and never repented having done so. My acquaintance with Walter ripened into friendship, and lasted as long as he lived.

This engagement made me for the first time a man of business. How I executed my task may be seen by a file of the Times. My articles are from "the banks of the Elbe;" the first is dated in March and the last in August, but there followed three letters from Stockholm and Gottenburg.*

* This correspondence, from "the banks of the Elbe," has reference to the hopes and fears and reports, which ended in the fall of Dantzic, the Battle of Friedland, and the Treaty of Tilsit. The immediate cause of Mr. Robinson's leaving Altona was that naval coalition against England, which rendered it necessary for the British Government to send Lord Cathcart to Copenhagen to secure the Danish fleet.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

Having defeated the Prussians at Jena, Napoleon had advanced into Poland, and the anxious attention of all Europe was directed to the campaign now going on there. Hamburg was in the possession of the French. Holstein, appertaining to the kingdom of Denmark, was a neutral frontier province; and Altona, its capital, was to be my residence as long as it continued to be secure, and as the intelligence of the campaign had interest for English politicians.

Dr. Ehlers.

I soon made my arrival known to my one only acquaintance, Dr. Ehlers, who, however, was sufficient for all purposes, as he forthwith initiated me into the best society of the place, and provided for my personal comforts by obtaining for me a lodging in a very agreeable family. I lived in the Königstrasse, in the house of Mr. Pauli, a mercantile agent, who had not been prosperous in business, but who was most happy in his wife—a very sensible and interesting woman, the sister of Poel, the proprietor of the Altona Mercury, a political newspaper in which liberal principles were asserted with discretion and propriety. Poel's wife was also a woman of great personal worth, and even of personal attractions, a daughter of the celebrated Professor Busch of Hamburg. These ladies had a friend, Madame Sieveking, who formed with them a society which in few places is equalled. She was a widow, residing at Hamburg, and was a daughter of the well-known Reimarus. On the borders of the Elbe, Poel had a country house, where, especially on Sundays, there used to be delightful dinner-parties. In this house my happiest hours were spent.

Altona.

Count d'Angiviller.

Among the most interesting of those, whose images still live in my memory, is the Count d'Angiviller. He had held in the court of Louis XVI. the office of Intendant of the Palaces, i.e. was a sort of Minister of Woods and Forests. His post gave him extensive patronage among artists and men of letters, with all of whom he had lived on terms of intimacy. His tall person, very dignified manners, rank, and advanced age combined to render him an object of universal interest. I was proud when I could get into conversation with him. One evening, at a party, I chanced to make use of the phrase "Diderot et D'Alembert." He instantly put his hand on my shoulder, and said, "Je vous prie, monsieur, de ne prononcer jamais ces noms au même temps dans ma présence. Vous me blessez les oreilles." I will not answer precisely for the words, but in substance he continued, "Diderot was a monster, guilty of every vice, but D'Alembert was an angel."

G. Stansfeld.

At the hotel I first saw George Stansfeld,* a young man from Leeds, who came to learn German and to qualify himself for mercantile life. We became intimate and mutually serviceable; and my friendship with him extended afterwards in England to all the members of his family.

Charles Villers.

I met one French man of letters, who has a name in connection with German philosophy. I thought his manners agreeable, but he did not appear to me likely to recommend the Kantian philosophy successfully to his countrymen. Yet his book, an account of Kant's philosophy, supplied for many years the sole information possessed by the French on that subject. His name was Charles Villers.

* The uncle of the present M.P. for Halifax.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

H. C. R. to his Brother.

Altona, March 23rd, 1807.

Dear Thomas,

. . . . My time has been spent very pleasurably indeed. I have seldom in so short a time made the acquaintance of so many excellent persons. My usual good fortune has brought me into the most intelligent circle in Altona; so that my second residence in Germany yields as much enjoyment as my former. I have at the same time been able to renew my old acquaintances by letter. I have heard from Herr von Knebel and Dr. Voigt. Both of them have had the good fortune to suffer little or nothing personally by the war; and Voigt seems rather to have enjoyed the scenes he has witnessed. Napoleon took up his lodgings in Voigt's father's house, and dwelt in a room where I have lounged many an hour. This at once secured the house from being plundered, and at the same time gave Voigt an opportunity of seeing most of the Marshals of France and the ruling men of the only ruling power in Europe. Knebel writes with more feeling, but with the resignation of a philosopher, who had foreseen all that has happened, and whose sensations are corrected by an admiration of Buonaparte, which was a source of contention between us, and a contempt of the German constitution and Princes, in which I joined with him. . . . .

Knebel and Voigt.

H. C. R. TO HIS BROTHER.

Altona, June 7th, 1807.

. . . . How do I spend my time? I will give a sort of average journal. I rise at seven, and carry into a summer-house in the garden my Italian books; here I prepare my lesson till nine, when my master comes, and with him a fellow-scholar (a very amiable man who holds an office under Government, and is also a man of letters). From nine to ten we receive our Italian lesson—that is, four mornings of the week. On Sundays and the two post mornings (Wednesday and Saturday) my companion has letters of business to write, and therefore we cannot have lessons. The rest of the morning is spent either in reading Italian or at the Museum. This is a sort of London Institution in miniature—here the newsmongers of the day associate—every member brings his quota of falsehood or absurdity, reason or facts, as his good luck favours him. Unfortunately, the former are the ordinary commodities, and I have no little difficulty in understanding or appreciating the fables of the hour. There is more bonhommie than ill-will in this. Every one feels what ought to take place, and every one is apt to confound what ought to be, and what he wishes to be, with what is. Hence we are as often taken in by certain intelligence of Russian and Prussian victories as you can be. Here, too, the politics of the English cabinet are reviewed; and I hear my old friends the Whig ministers derided and reproached for their scandalously weak, almost treacherous administration,

Mode of spending the day.

Politics.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

while I am unable to say a word in their defence, and can only mutter between my teeth, "God grant that we do not jump out of the frying-pan into the fire!" At half-past one I dine in the house of a clergyman, who, having no wife, keeps a table for a number of bachelors like himself. Our dinner is not very good, but it is very cheap, and the company is better than the dishes. We have two Danish officers, two physicians (one a man of talent, but a political despairer, an ex-jacobin), two jurists, two Englishmen. The other is a young man from Leeds (his name is Stansfeld), for whom I felt something like friendship when I found he is a Presbyterian. . . . . After dinner I either lounge with a book on the Elbe, or play chess with Mrs. Lütchens, a clever woman, the wife of Lütchens whom I have before mentioned as an old acquaintance of Mr. Clarkson. In the evening I am engaged generally about three times a week in company. Otherwise I go to Aders (Jameson's partner), a very clever, agreeable man; or he and one or two young men take tea with me. It is thus that day after day has slipt away insensibly, and I have been in danger of forgetting that the continuance of this most agreeable life is very precarious indeed. I am of opinion that it cannot possibly last long. In all probability we shall soon hear of a peace with Russia, or of a general engagement, which, it is ten to one, will end in the defeat of the Allies. In either event I have no doubt the French will take possession of Holstein. I am tolerably easy as to my personal security in this event, and should I even be caught napping and find a couple of gens-d'armes at the side of my bed when I awake some morning, the worst would be an imprisonment. I state the worst, hope the best, and expect neither the one nor the other. As long as Russia continues to bid defiance to Buonaparte, we shall be unmolested here. When this last protecting power is crushed or prevented from interfering in the concerns of the South, it is not difficult to foretell the measures the conqueror will take. Austria will again be partitioned, the northern maritime powers will be forced to shut up the Baltic, and perhaps arm their fleets against us. And the blockade will cease to be a mere bugbear. Then Napoleon will have to choose between an invasion, which will be a short but hazardous experiment; or, being now (thanks to our Whig administration) so closely allied to Turkey, he will turn his arms into the East and destroy our Indian empire by an attack from the interior. This latter undertaking would suit the romantic valour and vanity of himself and his people. These things may be prevented by more military skill on the part of the Russians, more character and resolution on the part of the Austrians, and more disinterested zeal in the general cause of Europe on the part of the British administration, than I fear any of these bodies severally possess. The world might be saved if it did not still suffer under an infatuation which resembles that of the Egyptian monarch—"And the Lord struck Pharaoh with blindness." How many Pharaohs have not sat as then twenty years on the thrones of Europe?

Friends at Altona.

Political expectations.

Politics.

But I have omitted some particulars in the account of myself here, which I must insert. Of all my acquaintances, the most interesting is Mr. Poel. He is the brother of my landlady, proprietor of the Altona Mercury, a man of letters, affluent and hospitable. He keeps a good table, and gives dinners and suppers several times a week. He was an ardent friend of the French Revolution, but is now in all things an anti-Gallican. But he is one of the few who, like Mrs. Barbauld's lover, will still "hope though hope were lost." He is persuaded that in the end the good cause will conquer. . . . . . .

Mr. Poel.

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

Post stopped between Altona and England.

In my attention to the incidents of the day I was unremitting. I kept up a constant intercourse with England. On my first arrival I learned that, notwithstanding the affected neutrality of Denmark, the post from Altona to England was stopped, and, in consequence, all letters were sent by Mr. Thornton, the English minister there,* privately to Husum. I called on him early, informed him I should regularly send letters under cover to the Foreign Office, which he promised should be punctually delivered. And he kept his word.

Progress of the French arms.

The progress of the French arms in Poland was the object of overwhelming interest, and the incessant subject of conversation with all of us. As we had but one political feeling—for I cannot call to mind having met with a single partisan of Napoleon—our social intercourse was not enlivened by contest; but I perceived that as the events became more disastrous, our cordiality increased, and that calamity served to cement friendship.

* He was Minister Plenipotentiary to the Hanse Towns.

Battle of Friedland.

I see from my notes that on the 20th of June the fatal news arrived of the great victory obtained over the Russians at Friedland, on the 14th. In ten days we were further informed of the armistice, which on the 7th of July was succeeded by the peace. But afflicting as these public events were to all of us, it was not till the middle of July that they began to affect me personally. On the 14th I learned that Mr. Thornton was gone. We had already heard reports that the English fleet was in the Sound, and the seizure of the Danish fleet by the English was the subject of speculation. Had I left Altona then, I could not have been reproached for cowardice; but I made up my mind to remain where I was, until some act on the part of the Government rendered my departure absolutely necessary.

Major von Spät.

Among the persons whose acquaintance I made at Poel's, was Major von Spät, the second in command in the town, under the chief magistrate, the Bürgermeister. With the Bürgermeister himself I used to play whist at the Museum. After the departure of Mr. Thornton, and other Englishmen, who had followed his example, I met the Major and said, "Do you not think, Major, that I am a very bold man in staying here, now that our minister is gone?"—"Not at all," he answered. "The Danish Government is much too honourable to resent on individuals, who are living in confidence in these dominions, the injustice of a foreign power." But, in the meanwhile, I took care to put my things in order, that, if necessary, I might decamp with the least possible incumbrance.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

On Sunday, the 16th, however, two days before the actual bombardment of Copenhagen, an end was put to these uncertainties, and to my residence in Holstein. In the forenoon I had a call from Mr. Aldebert, my first German friend, with whom I went to Germany in 1800, and who had property to a considerable amount warehoused in this town.

He, his clerk (Pietsch), another German, and myself, dined at Rainville's beautiful hotel. It was a fine day, and, as usual on Sundays, the gardens of the hotel were full of company. And here the Major renewed his assurance of my safety, "even should a war break out." After dinner I had a stroll with Stansfeld, who had removed to Hamburg, but had come over to see me. About five o'clock, I paid a visit to Madame Lütchens, whose husband was English, and in the service of the English Government, in the commissariat department. A month before, as I knew in confidence, he had proceeded to Stralsund. After an hour's chat with her I was going home, when I saw the Bürgermeister in the street, talking with an acquaintance; but, on my going up to them, he turned away abruptly, affecting not to see me. I thought this gross ill manners, and not warranted even by the reported demonstrations of hostility towards Denmark by England. By reference to the "Annual Register" I find it was on the 12th that Lord Cathcart, with a force of 20,000 men, joined the Admiral off Elsinore, and on the 16th (the day of which I am now speaking) that the army landed on the island of Zealand, eight miles from Copenhagen. But, of course, the public at Altona knew nothing correctly of these proceedings. On my way to Poel's in the evening I was met by William Sieveking, one of the sons of the lady whom I have mentioned. He had an air of anxiety about him, and told me I was wanted immediately at Mr. Poel's. I must go at once—something was the matter, but he could not say what. A large party of ladies were in the garden, and as soon as Madame Poel saw me, she exclaimed, "Thank God—there he is—he at least is safe!" I was then informed that Major von Spät had been there in great trouble. The Bürgermeister had received an order to arrest every Englishman, and at midnight there was to be a visitation of all the houses occupied by the English. The Major could not bear the thought of my being arrested, for perhaps I had remained there trusting to his assurance of my safety. I was therefore told that I must stay the night at Poel's country house, and be smuggled next day into Hamburg. But to this I would not consent. I insisted on at least going back to my lodgings to put money in my purse; and, disguising myself by borrowing a French hat, I immediately went back. Having arranged my own little matters, I resolved to give notice to all my fellow-countrymen with whose residences I was acquainted. And so effectual were my services in this respect, that no one, whom I knew, was arrested. Indeed the arrests were confined to a few journeymen, who were not considered worth keeping. Of course the Holsteiners had no wish to make prisoners, and therefore did their work very negligently.

Strange behaviour of the Bürgermeister.

Hurried departure.

I will relate a few anecdotes which have dwelt in my memory ever since. I need not say that the apparent

Chap. xi. — 1807.

rudeness of the Bürgermeister, which had so much annoyed me, was now accounted for.

Ogilvy.

There was one Ogilvy, a merchant, who resided with a lawyer, and to whom I sent the servant with a note. I was in a flurry, and wrote on a slip of paper, which was kept as a curiosity, and laughed at. It was shown to me afterwards at Hamburg. I had written on it these words: "They'll catch us if they can to-night. I mean the Danes. I'm off.—H. C. R." It was shown to the master of the house. "That Robinson is an arrant coward. It is nothing; you may depend on it." However, at midnight the police were at the door, and demanded admittance. When asked whether Mr. Ogilvy was at home, the servant, being forewarned, had a prompt answer: "I don't know. That's his room. He often sleeps at Hamburg." The police went in, and said to the sleeper, "You are our prisoner." On which Ogilvy's "German servant" awoke. "Why, who are you?" —"Mr. Ogilvy's servant. My master went to Hamburg last night, and as his bed is softer than mine, I sleep in his when he is away."—"Oh, that is it? Well, it is lucky for him, for we should have taken him. We have nothing to say to you."—"The stupids!", said Ogilvy; "there was my watch on the table, and my clothes were about the room." Rather say, "Good-natured fellows."

Incidents of escape.

Pietsch.

I sent a note to Pietsch also. He had more than a thousand pounds' worth of Manchester goods in a warehouse. In haste he removed them into a coach-house, and covered them with loose straw. The police came, demanded the keys of the warehouse, sealed door and windows with the Government seal, and threatened Pietsch with imprisonment if he broke the seal, or entered the warehouse. He solemnly promised he would not, and most honourably kept his word. In the course of a few nights all the goods were transported over the Elbe. The empty warehouse was formally opened by the Government officers, after the seals had been carefully examined, and it had been found that Pietsch had most conscientiously kept his promise.

Warning to friends.

There was then at Altona a Leeds merchant, named Bischoff, a connection of Stansfeld's. I did not know the name of the street in which he lived, and so was forced to go myself. He was in bed. Young Stansfeld accompanied me, and we went together into his room. After he had heard my story, he said to Stansfeld, "Ist das wahr was er sagt?" ("Is what he says true?") I was half angry, and left him to give notice to one who would receive it more gratefully. There was, however, another Englishman in the house, and he thought it prudent to give heed to the warning; they went out, and begged a lodging in the stable of a garden-house in the suburb leading to Poel's. There they slept. At daybreak, the morning was so fine that they could not believe there was any evil going on. The sunshine made them discredit the story, and they resolved to re-enter the town. Fortunately they saw the servant of Pauli at the gate. "Is Mr. Robinson at home?"—"No, sir, he went away last night, and it is well he did, for at midnight there came some soldiers to take him up." This was enough. Bischoff and Elwin took to their heels, and not daring to go into Hamburg by the Altona gate, made a circuit of many miles, and did not arrive at Hamburg till late in the day.

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

Having done all that patriotic good-nature required of me, and left everything in order, I went back to Neuemühle, where a bed was provided for me. Early in the morning Poel said, "You cannot possibly remain here. You must go immediately after breakfast to Hamburg. I have ordered a boat to be here, and my children, and some of the Paulis and Sievekings, shall go with you; and if you are questioned you will be the tutor." Accordingly there was a boat well filled by the tutor and his pupils. We rowed towards the town, where I noticed at the gate some soldiers sitting in a boat. This was unusual, and seemed to me suspicious. So, as we were approaching, I said to the boatman, "I never saw Altona from the Hanover side of the river. It must look very pretty from a distance."—"Ay, sir, it does," said the man.—"I should like to see it. I'll give you a klein Thaler (about 2s.) if you will row us to that side."—"Thankee, sir," said the man; and instantly we crossed the Thalweg, that is, the centre of the river. Now, it would have been a breach of neutrality—a crime, in any police officers to make an arrest on the Hanoverian territory, which included the left side of the river,—and I was there safe. To be perfectly secure, I would not land at the first Hamburg gate, but was rowed to the second.*

Landing at Hamburg.

There the tutor dismissed his pupils, and I went in search of Mr. Aldebert at his lodgings.

I found a post-chaise at his door. Pietsch had informed him of what he had been doing on the notice I had given him; and Mr. Aldebert was then going to Altona partly to look after me. After thanking me for the service I had rendered him, he said, "I have provided for you here. I occupy the first floor, indeed all the apartments not occupied by the family; but there is a very small garret in which you can sleep, and you can use my rooms as your own." No arrangement could be better; and as on the same evening he left for several days, I had the use of his handsome apartments. The house was in the Neue Wall, one of the most respectable streets: it was among those burnt down in the late conflagration.* But I cannot pretend that my mind was quite at ease, or that I was not sensible of the peril of my situation.

* The French took possession of Hamburg after the battle of Jena, in 1806.

Refuge in Mr. Aldebert's lodgings.

My clothes were brought piecemeal, and at last came my empty trunk. Among the German merchants I had several acquaintances, and I occasionally met my English fellow-refugees. The French Government at this moment cared nothing about us; nor the Danish, as it seemed, though, as I afterwards learned, I was an exception to this general indifference.

I have a very imperfect recollection of the incidents of the next few days, and I did not think it prudent to keep in my possession letters or memoranda which might compromise my friends.

H. C. R. TO J. D. COLLIER, ESQ.

Hamburg, August 22nd, 1807.

My dear Friend,

. . . . You may think that a long letter of gossip would be very charming from a person in my

* This was written in 1853; the fire took place in 1842.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

Letter from H. C. R.

situation; it would be absolutely romantic, and would be as far preferable to one from an ordinary correspondent, as an elopement in the eyes of Miss Lydia Languish to being asked at church. This is all very well for the reader, but not so for the writer. Give me leave to assure you that a man who is a prisoner, or, what is much the same thing, liable to become so every hour of his life, has little inclination to sit down and, as the phrase is, open his heart to his friends, because he is never sure that his enemies may not chuse at the same time to take a peep. . . . . . . In the meanwhile I shall be forced to abstain from the enjoyment of almost all direct communication with my friends at home. . . . . . Within the last three days nothing of importance has occurred.

Alarm of friends.

25*th August*. . . . . . . Hitherto my good spirits have not often left me; and I assure you it is the reflected concern of my different friends at home that most affects me. I must add, too, that I feel my own personal affairs to be infinitely insignificant compared with the dreadful calamity that overhangs us all. Never was England so nearly in the jaws of ruin. . . . . . My late escape and that of my countrymen has occasioned me to observe many interesting and gratifying scenes. I, for my part, felt more flattered by being the object of concern to so many charming women, than alarmed by the personal danger. I have also made an observation curious to the psychologist, and that is the perfect repose which arises from the consciousness that nothing further is to be done by one's self. Formerly, when I came now and then to Hamburg to buy an old book or chat with a friend, it was done with great anxiety; and I was not at ease till again within the Altona gates. Now I am quite comfortable, though the danger is ten times greater. I can do no more than I have done. If I am taken, I shall bear as well as I can the positive evils of imprisonment; but I shall suffer no reproaches from myself nor fear those of others. And it is this which I am most apprehensive of. If I had the means of escape, and was doubtful whether I should avail myself of them, I should be in constant alarm and perturbation; but now I have nothing to do but to amuse myself as well as I can, and watch for opportunities of getting off, if any should offer. I am, generally, speaking comfortable. I am not without companions. My kind respects to all.

CHAP. XI.

1807.

On the 19th I accompanied a merchant of the name of Kaufmann to his country house at an adjacent village, Ham, and strolled about in an unsettled state; and day by day I gained courage; but on the 25th I again narrowly escaped capture.

H. C. R. especially suspected.

My friend, the Major, called on me to warn me that I must be on my guard. The Governor, or Bürgermeister, Mr. Levezow, had said to him that, excepting myself, he was very glad all the English had escaped. The suspicion had entered his mind that I was a secret agent of the Government. I could not, he thought, be living at such a place at such a time without some especial purpose. "And I think" (added Von Spät), "that he has given a hint to the French authorities." I assured the Major that the suspicion was unfounded.

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

and explained to him what might have given occasion to the mistake. "He was glad," he said, "to know this, and he would take care to inform Mr. Levezow of what I had told him."

It was, however, too late; for a few hours afterwards, as I was returning home, after a short walk, my attention was excited by a sound—St! st! But for the information I had just received, I should hardly have noticed it. I looked, and saw a fellow—the letter-carrier between Hamburg and Altona, who knew me well, beckoning to some persons at a little distance; and at the same time, he looked back and pointed at me. At a glance I perceived that they were French gens-d'armes. They were lolling by the side of a passage, and within sight of my door.

Second narrow escape.

In an instant I was off. I ran into a market-place full of people, and was not pursued. If I had been, I have no doubt the populace would have aided my escape. I repaired to the house of one of Mr. Aldebert's friends, a Mr. Spalding, a senator. There I dined. I told my story, and it was agreed that I should not sleep again at my lodgings. The next day but one Mr. Spalding was going to the Mecklenburg watering-place, Dobberan, with his family. He would take a passport for his clerk, and in that capacity I might accompany him.

The intermediate day was spent in removing my clothes and taking leave of my friends. Yet in that day I twice thought I saw a suspicious person lurking in the vicinity of my last asylum; and next day, when I had left the town several hours, my lodging was beset by the military. Some gens-d'armes, without asking any questions, went to my garret, burst open the door, and expressed great disappointment at finding the room empty. They used violent threats towards the women of the house, who told the truth with equal safety to themselves and me. Through a friend I had obtained from the French authorities a visa to my old Jena pass; and I had a passport from Netzel, the Swedish consul at Altona, with a letter from him, which might, and in fact did, prove useful. Dobberan was then a small village, with a few large houses to accommodate the bathing guests; but the sea was nearly three miles off. Travelling all night, we arrived on the following day, in time to dine at a table with 150 covers, at which the sovereign Duke, though absent this day, was accustomed to take a seat.

Dobberan.

I had now to ascertain what vessels were about to set sail for Sweden. In the afternoon I took a solitary walk to the seaside. There I found none of the "airy forces" which, according to Dr. Watts's bad sapphic, "roll down the Baltic with a foaming fury," but a naked sea-coast with a smooth sea, enlivened by a distant view of several English men-of-war, part of a blockading squadron.

Rostock.

Next day I took a walk of about ten miles to the little town of Rostock—a university town, and also a sea-port. But no vessel was there; nor had I any prospect of being able to make my escape. In ordinary circumstances, indeed, escape would be an unmeaning term, for I was known to the sovereign, who had occasionally chatted with me at Altona. I took an early opportunity of calling upon one of his household, and begged I might be excused for not waiting on His Serene Highness, as I was aware of his position, and was anxious not to embarrass him. This message was very courteously received. I was assured of every protection in the Duke's power; but was requested not to call myself an Englishman, and excuse his affecting not to know me.

Chap. xi. — 1807.

The Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

The good Duke, however, could not act on his own sage counsel, for, as I was one day not far from him at the table-d'hôte, but carefully avoiding speaking to him or catching his eye, I was surprised by hearing behind me in a loud whisper, "Prosit Herr Engländer." His Serene Highness had filled a bumper, and leaning back behind the guests, drank to me as an Englishman, though he had pretended to consider me an American. And one morning, having walked to the seaside, and jumped into the water from a long board built into the sea (the humble accommodation provided in those days), I was startled by a loud cry, which proceeded from the Duke at the end of the board—"Herr Engländer, Herr Engländer, steigen Sie gleich aus—10,000 Franzosen sind gleich angekommen, und wenn Sie nicht aussteigen und weglaufen, wird man Sie arretiren." ("Make haste out, Englishman—10,000 Frenchmen are just come, and unless you come out and run for it, you will be made a prisoner.")

More good nature than dignity in this certainly. But the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin was one of that class of petty sovereigns in Germany, who, if they conferred no honour on their rank and power, did not abuse them to the injury of their subjects. I had a formal offer from him to send me on board the fleet, which was in the offing, if I would guarantee the safety of his men. This offer I declined. I could be more sure of being taken in than set down again. And meanwhile I relied on the friendly interest which every one took in me; for, though the Mecklenburg flag had been declared hostile, I was satisfied that every one whom I saw was well disposed towards me.

Wismar.

On the evening of the 1st of September, I received a letter informing me that a ship was on the point of sailing from Wismar to Stockholm. Next day I proceeded to Wismar, where I remained till the 8th. The only circumstance which made me remember these few days was the intercourse which I had with the guests at the inn, and which I recall with pleasure as evidence of the kindness of disposition generally found among those who are free to be actuated by their natural feelings.

Companions at the inn.

On the evening of my arrival the waiter laid me a cover near the head of the table. Above me sat a colonel of Napoleon's Italian Guard, who was resting here for a few weeks after the fatigues of the campaign ended by the recent peace. At the head of the table was a Dutch general, then on his way to join Napoleon in Prussia. Other officers were present; and there were also civilians, chiefly merchants.

I passed myself for a German, talking bad French to the Italians, with whom I soon became well acquainted, and remained on the best terms till my departure. They were glad to read a few very common

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

Italian officers in the French service.

Italian books, which I was able to lend them. Without any hypocrisy, I could praise Italian literature; and I found I could with perfect safety abuse the French. "Is it not to be lamented" (I said in one of our walks after dinner) "that Italy, which in former ages has been the mistress of the world in different ways, should be overpowered by a nation that never produced a great man?" This was strong, but not too strong. The eyes of my companions glistened with pleasure. One of them exclaimed, "Don't suppose it is the Italians who are conquered by the French. It is the French who are governed by an Italian. As long as Napoleon lives he will be master of Europe. As soon as he goes Italy will be independent!"—"I hope to God it will be so!" Sometimes I ventured to touch on Buonaparte himself; but that was tender ground. They looked grave, and I stopped. On general politics they talked freely. They had liberal opinions, but little information,—were a sort of republican followers of Buonaparte,—good-natured men, with little intelligence, and no fixed principles of any kind, especially on religion.

Good will of the Dutch.

One evening a Dutch merchant came. He looked me full in the face and said, "Napoleon is all but omnipotent; but there is one thing he cannot do—make a Dutchman hate an Englishman." I asked him to drink with me.

Among the stray visitors was a German who had formerly studied at Jena. We became good friends at once. I had told him at table that I was Jenenser (true in one sense). After dinner, when we had gone aside,

I said, "I am——" "You are," he said, interrupting me, "an Englishman."—"Who told you so?"—"Everybody. Were you not at Rostock a few days ago?"—"Yes."—"And did you not sit next a gentleman in green, a Forester?"—"I did."—"I thought you must be the same from the description. My father said you talked with admirable fluency—quite well enough to deceive a Frenchman—but he had no doubt you had escaped from Altona. I was here a few days ago, and after you had left the room I said to the colonel, 'Who is that gentleman?' He said, 'C'est un Anglais qui veut bien jouer l'Allemand, mais c'est un bon enfant—nous le laissons passer.'"

This information rather assured than alarmed me. From my companions here I had no apprehension; but I had letters from Stansfeld telling me on no account to return to Hamburg.

At length, on the 8th of September, after various disappointments, the master of the little vessel in which I had taken my passage came to me with the news that he should weigh anchor in an hour.

Departure from Rostock.

I went to my landlady and paid my bill, my portmanteau being already gone. I said to her, "Do you know what countryman I am?"—"Lord love you!" she cried out, "every one knows you. When you walk in the streets, the children say, 'Da geht der Engländer.'"—"And the Italian officers—do they know who I am?"—"To be sure they do. I have heard them speak about you when they did not suppose I understood them. It is useful in our situation to know more than people are aware of. They like you. I have heard them say they had no doubt you had run away from the Danes. And I am very sure that if they were ordered to take you up, they would give you an opportunity of escape." This I believe. I sent a friendly message to them, with an apology for not taking formal leave.

CHAP. XI.
1807.

Voyage.

I made my voyage in a poor little vessel with a cargo of salt fish on board. The voyage lasted five long days. There was no passenger but myself; and the crew consisted of only four or five, including boys. One night we had a storm, and I was shut up alone in the cabin. I never before felt such entire wretchedness.

On the other hand, the pleasure was intense when the master came to me in my cabin, and said I should have something good for breakfast if I would get up. I had just begun to have an appetite. On my rising he poured part of a bowl of cream into my cup. I was quite astonished, and hastening on deck, found myself surrounded by picturesque and romantic masses of rock on every side. We were on the coast of Sweden, not far from Dalarö, the port of Stockholm. On these barren and naked rocks I saw some huts, and a momentary feeling of envy towards the happy residents on those quiet solid spots of earth caused me to laugh at myself.

Dalarö.

Dalarö is a miserable little village in a wild position at the mouth of the winding river on which Stockholm is built. Here passengers are accustomed to alight, as the windings of the river render the voyage long. My intention, however, was to remain in the vessel; but I was led to change my plan. My portmanteau was brought to me quite wet. It had fallen into the water; and this accident afforded me another opportunity of witnessing the kindness of strangers. The collector of the customs could speak Swedish only, but through a person present who knew English, he invited me to spend the evening at his house. Calling his servants, and asking me for my key, he opened my box, and all my clothes and linen were at once seized and carried off by the women. My books and papers were carefully collected, and laid on a stove to dry. In a few minutes I was told that my host was going to fetch his wife, who was on a visit to a friend, and I was invited to accompany him. We entered a stately boat, and were rowed by six men, through — what shall I say? — streets and valleys of stone, a labyrinth of rocks and water. We alighted at steps which led to a neat house, surrounded by fir-trees, the only trees of the place. There Madame had been, but she was gone. The master of the house, a sea-captain, named Blum, spoke a little bad English, and regaled me with dried beef, biscuit, and brandy. It was a scene, and my companions were fit for the characters of a romance. On our return by another water-way we found the lady and her sister had arrived. They were pretty women, and spoke a little French. My supper was nice, and consisted chiefly of novelties—dried goose (cured as we cure hams, and as red), salt fish, oaten cakes, and hot custard.

Swedish Hospitality.

After supper, seeing that I was fatigued, the lady of the house took a candle, and said she would accompany me to my room. Those who were present rose; I was shown into a neat room with a bed in an alcove, and they sat with me five minutes, as if they were paying me a visit in my own apartment. When I got up next morning, after a long and sound night's sleep, I found in an antechamber all my clothes dry and clean, the linen washed and ironed.

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

Drive from Dalarö to Stockholm.

The next day, the 15th of September, I proceeded to Stockholm. The drive in a little waggon or open chaise, not broader at the wheels than a sedan chair, was very amusing. I passed a succession of rocky and wooded scenes, with many pieces of water—I could not tell whether sea or lake. In addition to the fir, I noticed the birch, and a few oaks; but the latter seemed to languish. Few houses were to be seen—all of wood bedaubed with red ochre, which at a distance gives the appearance of a brick building. The road was most excellent, and the horses, though small, were capital goers. We kept on in one trot without intermission, and made the journey in less than five hours.

Stockholm.

"The entrance into Stockholm, through the southern suburb" (I wrote at the time), "disappoints the expectation raised by the brilliant view in the distance; for the greater number of the houses are low and poor, some even roofed with earth, and the larger houses have an uncomfortable air of nakedness and coldness from the absence of architectural decorations—the windows without sills, the fronts without cornice, pediment, &c. But its position is singularly striking. In England—but then it would be no longer Stockholm—it would be one of the most remarkable cities in the world. In other words, were English capital and English enterprise applied to it, it would be unrivalled. It stands on seven islands, but is cut into three great divisions by large basins of water, two salt and one fresh, which are not crowded with vessels, but are beautiful streets of still water, exhibiting shores at various distances and of diversified character. The island on which stand the royal palace and the state buildings, presents a remarkable mass of picturesque and romantic objects."

Beauty of situation.

More than thirty years ago I wrote this description in a letter. I have since seen Edinburgh, Rome, Venice, Naples, and Palermo; and I now think, if I am not deceived by imperfect recollection, that Stockholm would, for beauty of situation, bear comparison with any of these.

Tode.

Having fixed myself in the best hotel in the city, I delivered a letter which had been given to me at Dalarö. It was addressed to a young man, named Tode, a merchant's clerk, who I was assured knew English, was intelligent and obliging, and would be proud to be my cicerone. I found him all this, and even more. He was my companion to churches, palaces, and public buildings, and was most kind and assiduous in his attentions.

Amelia von Imhoff.

I also went in search of a lady not unknown in the literary world, and who as a poetess is still recollected with respect under the name of Amelia von Imhoff. She had been Maid of Honour to one of the Duchesses of Saxe-Weimar, which office she held when I visited Weimar in 1803–4. Her reputation she owed chiefly to an Idyllic tale, "Die Schwester von Lesbos." She had married a Swedish general, Von Helwig. I was received by her with great cordiality. During my stay at Stockholm Herr von Helwig was from home. I was almost the first Weimar acquaintance she had seen since her marriage, and I had interesting facts to relate concerning her native country. She was engaged to dine that day with a Polish countess, wife of Herr von Engerström, an historic character; and she instantly wrote a note intimating that she should bring with her an English gentleman, a personal friend, just arrived. There came an answer, in which the Countess expressed her regret that her dinner was not such as she could with propriety set before a foreign gentleman. She would receive me some other day. Frau von Helwig laughed at this, and with reason. I went, and certainly never was present at a more copious banquet, or one at which the company seemed more distinguished, judging by title and appearance. I cannot specify foreign dishes after thirty-six years, but I did make a memorandum that I used eleven plates at the meal. One national custom I recollect. The company being assembled in the drawing-room before dinner, two large silver waiters were brought in, one full of liqueur glasses of brandy, the other of little pieces of bread and cheese. Whilst these were being carried round to the gentlemen, the ladies went by themselves into the dining-room; and when we followed we found them seated at table, every alternate chair being left vacant. This was an interesting day, and I regret that I am not better able to remember the conversation, which was indicative of the state of opinion among the Swedish gentry and nobility at a most critical period.

CHAP. XI. — 1807.

Dinner at Herr von Engerström's.

This was the 16th of September, and it should be borne in mind that Copenhagen capitulated to the English on the 7th, and that before very long (March, 1809) the King of Sweden was driven from the throne. Partly by my own observation at the dinner-party, and partly by the information given me by Frau von Helwig, I became fully aware of the unpopularity of the King. I was struck by the coldness with which every remark I made in his praise was received; but I was in some measure prepared for this by what I had heard from the minister at Altona. On my reading to him Wordsworth's sonnet, his only comment was that the poet had happily and truly described the King as "above all consequences;" and on my eulogizing the King to Herr von Engerström for his heroic refusal to negotiate with Buonaparte, the reply was, "Personne ne doute que le roi soit un homme d'honneur."

Unpopularity of the King of Sweden.

Among the company were two military men of great personal dignity, and having the most glorious titles imaginable. One was a knight of the "Northern Star;" the other a knight of the "Great Bear," the constellation. I had been introduced as a German, and was talking with these Chevaliers when Frau von Helwig joined us, and said something that betrayed my being an Englishman. Immediately one of them turned away. The cause was so obvious that my friend was a little piqued, and remonstrated with him. He made an awkward apology, and unsuccessfully denied her imputation. This anti-English feeling was so general in Sweden at this time that I was advised to travel as a German through the country, and in fact did so.

Anti-English feeling.

CHAP. XI. — 1807. Arndt.

On the 18th I dined with Frau von Helwig. She had invited to meet me a man whom I was happy to see, and whose name will survive among the memorable names of the last age. I refer to the patriotic Arndt. He had fled from the proscription of Buonaparte. His life was threatened, for he was accused, whether with truth I do not know, of being the author of the book for the publication of which Salm had been shot. My falling in with him now caused me to read his works, and occasioned my translating entire his prophecy in the year 1805 of the insurrection of the Spaniards, which actually took place within less than a year of our rencontre in Sweden. This I inserted in a review* of Wordsworth's pamphlet on the convention of Cintra. I was delighted by this lively little man, very spirited and luminous in his conversation, and with none of those mystifying abstractions of which his writings are full. He spoke with great admiration of our "Percy's Reliques."

Journey in Sweden.

On the 21st I set out on my journey to Gottenburg, having bought a conveyance, with whip and other accompaniments, which altogether cost me about £4. The peasants are obliged to supply horses, and I paid 9*d.* per horse for each stage of about seven miles. My driver was sometimes a man or boy, but sometimes also a woman or girl. I am not accustomed to make economical statements, but it is worth mentioning that, including the loss on the resale of my carriage, the whole expense of my journey, over 350 miles, during seven days, was less than £6! I had been furnished with a card, not bigger than my hand, and yet containing all the Swedish words I should want. With this I managed to pass through the country, without meeting with any incivility or inconvenience; and, after what I have said as to expense, I need not add, without being imposed upon. How many Swedes will say the same of a journey in England? The only occasion on which I thought I had reason to complain, was when a peasant provided for my driver a child who could not hold the reins.

* In Cumberland's "London Review."

Civility and honesty of the Swedish people.

With the name of Sweden I had associated no other idea than that of barren rocks; but during the first four days of my journey, in which I left behind me 250 miles, there was an uninterrupted succession of beautiful forest scenery. The roads were admirable, needing no repair, for the substance was granite. There was no turnpike from beginning to end. The scenery was diversified by a number of lakes, every now and then a small neat town, or a pretty village, and a very few country houses. The fir, or pine, and beech were almost the only trees.

Gottenburg.

I reached Gottenburg on the 27th. The environs of the town consist of masses of rock with very scanty interstices of meagre vegetation,—a scene of dreary barrenness; yet commerce has enriched this spot, and the Gottenburg merchants, as I witnessed, partake of the luxuries which wealth can transport anywhere.

On the 30th I commenced my voyage homewards; the age of steam was not come, but after a comfortable passage of eight days, I sighted the coast of my native country. We landed at Harwich on the afternoon of the 7th of October.

CHAP. XI.
—
1807.

H. C. R. TO T. R.

Harwich, 7th Oct., 1807.

Thank God I once more touch English land. To-night I mean to sleep at Witham. To-morrow I shall be in town. And I suppose before long shall come to Bury. I shall in the meanwhile expect your letter of congratulation.

Kind love to father, sister, little Tom, and everybody.

CHAPTER XII.

H. C. R. as writer for the Times.

VERY soon after my return from Holstein, Mr. Walter proposed that I should remain in the service of the Times as a sort of foreign editor; that is, I was to translate from the foreign papers, and write on foreign politics. This engagement began at the close of the year; and I entered on my duties in high spirits. I could not easily find in my life a six months in which I was more happy in every respect. I began to feel that I had something to do, and could do it. In looking back on my work, I see nothing to be proud of in it; but it connected me with public life, and that at least was agreeable. And though I did not form a portion of the literary society of London, I was brought into its presence.

It was my practice to go to Printing House Square at five, and to remain there as long as there was anything to be done.

Connection with the Times.

After a time I had the name of editor, and as such opened all letters. It was my office to cut out odd articles and paragraphs from other papers, decide on the admission of correspondence, &c.; but there was always a higher power behind. While I was in my room, Mr. Walter was in his, and there the great leader, the article that was talked about, was written. Nor did I ever write an article on party politics during my continuance in that post. I may, however, add, that in

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

February I inserted a letter with my initials, which was, I believe, of real use to the Government. It is to be found in the paper printed on Feb. 13th. It is a justification of the English Government for the seizure of the Danish ships. The Ministry defended themselves very ill in the House of Commons. In my letter, I stated the fact that the Holstein post office refused to take in my letters to England, and alleged as a reason that Buonaparte had obliged the Government to stop the communication with England. The same evening, in the House of Lords, this fact was relied upon by the Marquis of Wellesley as conclusive. Indeed, it was more to the purpose than any fact alleged by the Government speakers.

Dinner at Dr. Aikin's.

In the month of March I was invited to dine with Southey at Dr. Aikin's. I was charmed with his person and manners, and heartily concurred with him in his opinions on the war. I copy from a letter to my brother—"Southey said that he and Coleridge were directly opposed in politics. He himself thought the last administration (Whig) so impotent that he could conceive of none worse except the present; while Coleridge maintained the present ministry to be so corrupt that he thought it impossible there could be a worse except the late." On poetry we talked likewise: I bolted my critical philosophy, and was defended by Southey throughout. I praised Wordsworth's "Sonnets" and preface. In this, too, Southey joined; he said that the sonnets contain the profoundest political wisdom, and the preface he declared to be "the quintessence of the philosophy of poetry."

Southey.

Wordsworth.

A few days after this (viz. on March 15th) I was introduced to Wordsworth. I breakfasted with him at Lamb's and accompanied him to Mr. Hardcastle's, at Haleham, Deptford, with whom Mrs. Clarkson was on a visit. Wordsworth received me very cordially, owing, I have no doubt, to a favourable introduction by Mrs. Clarkson, aided, of course, by my perfect agreement with him in politics; and my enthusiastic and unconcealed admiration of his poetry gave me speedy admission to his confidence. At this first meeting he criticised unfavourably Mrs. Barbauld's poetry, which I am the less unwilling to mention as I have already recorded a later estimate of a different kind. He remarked that there is no genuine feeling in the line,—

> In what brown hamlet dost thou joy?*

Mrs. Barbauld's poetry.

He said, "Why brown?" He also objected to Mrs. Barbauld's line,—

> "The lowliest children of the ground, moss-rose and violet," &c.

"Now," said he, "moss-rose is a shrub." The last remark is just, but I dissent from the first; for evening harmonizes with content, and the brown hamlet is the evening hamlet. Collins has with exquisite beauty described the coming on of evening,—

> "And hamlets brown, and dim discover'd spires."

Wordsworth, in my first tête-à-tête with him, spoke freely and praisingly of his own poems, which I never felt to be unbecoming, but the contrary. He said he thought of writing an essay on "Why bad poetry pleases." He never wrote it—a loss to our literature.

* Ode to Content.

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

He spoke at length on the connection of poetry with moral principles as well as with a knowledge of the principles of human nature. He said he could not respect the mother who could read without emotion his poem—

"Once in a lonely hamlet I sojourn'd."

He said he wrote his "Beggars" to exhibit the power of physical beauty and health and vigour in childhood, even in a state of moral depravity. He desired popularity for his

"Two voices are there, one is of the sea,"

as a test of elevation and moral purity.

Coleridge's Lectures.

I have a distinct recollection of reading in the Monthly Review a notice of the first volume of Coleridge's poems before I went abroad in 1800, and of the delight the extracts gave me; and my friend Mrs. Clarkson having become intimate with him, he was an object of interest with me on my return from Germany in 1805. And when he delivered lectures in the year 1808, she wished me to interest myself in them. I needed, however, no persuasion. It was out of my power to be a regular attendant, but I wrote to her two letters, which have been printed, for want of fuller materials, in the "Notes and Lectures on Shakespeare," edited by Mrs. Henry Coleridge.* At the time of my attending these lectures I had no personal acquaintance with Coleridge. I have a letter from him, written in May, 1808, sending me an order for admission. He says, "Nothing but endless interruptions, and the necessity of dining out far oftener

* Pickering, 1849.

Coleridge's Lectures.

than is either good for me, or pleasant to me, joined with reluctance to move (partly from exhaustion by company I cannot keep out, for one cannot, dare not always be 'not at home,' or 'very particularly engaged,'—and the last very often will not serve my turn) these, added to my bread and cheese employments, + my lectures, which are—bread and cheese, i.e. a very losing bargain in a pecuniary view, have prevented me day after day from returning your kind call. I will as soon as I can. In the meantime I have left your name with the old woman and the attendants in the office, as one to whom I am always 'at home' when I am at home. For Wordsworth has taught me to desire your acquaintance, and to esteem you; and need I add that any one so much regarded by my friend Mrs. Clarkson can never be indifferent, &c. &c., to S. T. Coleridge."*

* I find among my papers two pages of notes of Coleridge's lecture, Feb. 5th., 1808:—

Feb. 5th, 1808. Lecture 2nd on Poetry (Shakespeare), &c.
Detached Minutes.

The Grecian Mythology exhibits the symbols of the powers of nature and Hero-worship blended together. Jupiter both a King of Crete and the personified Sky.

Bacchus expressed the organic energies of the Universe which work by passion—a joy without consciousness; while Minerva, &c., imported the preordaining intellect. Bacchus expressed the physical origin of heroic character, a felicity beyond prudence.

In the devotional hymns to Bacchus the germ of the first Tragedy. Men like to imagine themselves to be the characters they treat of—hence dramatic representations. The exhibition of action separated from the devotional feeling. The Dialogue became distinct from the Chorus.

The Greek tragedies were the Biblical instruction for the people.

Comedy arose from the natural sense of ridicule which expresses itself naturally in mimickry.

Mr. Coleridge, in Italy, heard a quack in the street, who was accosted by his servant-boy smartly; a dialogue ensued which pleased the mob; the next day

CHAP. XII.
—
1808.

Sir Charles Bunbury.

In a visit to Bury, my friend Hare Naylor being a guest at the house of Sir Charles Bunbury, my brother and I were invited to dinner by this beau-ideal of an English sportsman, who was also well known as a Whig politician and a man of honour. A few months afterwards I met him in London, when I was walking with Lamb. Sir Charles shook hands with me, and asked where my regiment was. I evaded the question. Lamb the quack, having perceived the good effect of an adjunct, hired a boy to talk with him. In this way a play might have originated.

The modern Drama, like the ancient, originated in religion. The priests exhibited the miracles and splendid scenes of religion.

Tragi-Comedy arose from the necessity of amusing and instructing at the same time.

The entire ignorance of the ancient Drama occasioned the reproduction of it on the restoration of literature.

Harlequin and the Clown are the legitimate descendants from the Vice and Devil of the ancient Comedy. In the early ages, very ludicrous images were mixed with the most serious ideas, not without a separate attention being paid to the solemn truths; the people had no sense of impiety; they enjoyed the comic scenes, and were yet edified by the instruction of the serious parts. Mr. Coleridge met with an ancient MS. at Helmstädt, in which God was represented visiting Noah's family. The descendants of Cain did not pull off their hats to the great visitor, and received boxes of the ear for their rudeness; while the progeny of Abel answered their catechism well. The Devil prompted the bad children to repeat the Lord's Prayer backwards.

The Christian polytheism withdrew the mind from attending to the whisperings of conscience; yet Christianity in its worst state was not separated from humanity (except where zeal for Dogmata interfered). Mahometanism is an anomalous corruption of Christianity.

In the production of the English Drama, the popular and the learned writers by their opposite tendencies contributed to rectify each other. The learned would have reduced Tragedy to oratorical declamation, while the vulgar wanted a direct appeal to their feelings. The many feel what is beautiful, but they also deem a great deal to be beautiful which is not in fact so: they cannot distinguish the counterfeit from the genuine. The vulgar love the Bible and also Hervey's "Meditations."

The essence of poetry universality. The character of Hamlet, &c., affects all men; addresses to personal feeling; the sympathy arising from a reference to individual sensibility spurious. [N.B. This applies to Kotzebue.]

was all astonishment—"I had no idea that you knew Sheridan."—"Nor do I. That is Sir Charles Bunbury."—"That's impossible. I have known him to be Sheridan all my life. That shall be Sheridan. You thief! you have stolen my Sheridan!"

German studies.

That I did not quite neglect my German studies is shown by my having translated for the Monthly Repository Lessing's "Education of the Race."*

Entering the Middle Temple.

Though I had not the remotest intention now of studying the Law, yet during this spring I luckily entered myself a member of the Middle Temple; and I at the same time exercised myself in business speaking by attending at the Surrey Institution.

Journey to Spain as correspondent of the Times.

During some weeks my mind was kept in a state of agitation in my editorial capacity. The Spanish revolution had broken out, and as soon as it was likely to acquire so much consistency as to become a national concern, the Times, of course, must have its correspondent in Spain; and it was said, who so fit to write from the shores of the Bay of Biscay as he who had successfully written from the banks of the Elbe? I did not feel at liberty to reject the proposal of Mr. Walter that I should go, but I accepted the offer reluctantly. I had not the qualifications to be desired, but then I had experience. I had some advantage also in the friendship of Amyot, who gave me letters which were eventually of service; and I was zealous in the cause of Spanish independence.

Voyage.

I left London by the Falmouth mail on the night of July 19th, reached Falmouth on the 21st, and on the * Monthly Repository, Vol. I., 1806, pp. 412, 467.

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

23rd embarked in a lugger belonging to Government—the Black Joke, Captain Alt. The voyage was very rough, and, as I afterwards learnt, even dangerous. We were for some time on a lee shore, and obliged to sail with more than half the vessel under water; a slight change in the wind would have overset us; but of all this I was happily ignorant.

Corunna.

I landed at Corunna on the evening of Sunday, July 31st, and was at once busily employed. I found the town in a state of great disorder; but the excitement was a joyous one, the news having just arrived of the surrender of a French army in the south under Marshal Dupont. This little town, lying in an out-of-the-way corner of Spain, was at this period of importance, because, being the nearest to England, it became the point of communication between the Spanish and English Governments. The state of enthusiastic feeling in Galicia, as well as in every other province of Spain where the French were not, rendered the English objects of universal interest. I took with me several letters of introduction, both to merchants and to men in office, but they were hardly necessary. As soon as I could make myself intelligible in bad Spanish, and even before, with those who understood a little French, I was acceptable everywhere, and I at once felt that I should be in no want of society. I put myself in immediate connection with the editor of the miserable little daily newspaper, and from him I obtained Madrid papers and pamphlets. There were also a number of Englishmen in the place—some engaged in commerce, others attracted by curiosity. And there was already in the State of political feeling in Spain.

Description of the town.

harbour the Defiance, a 74-gun ship, Captain Hotham, with whom and his officers I soon formed an interesting acquaintance. Of the town itself I shall merely say this ; it lies at the extremity of one horn of a bay, and is very picturesque in its position. The rocks which run along the tongue of land are exceedingly beautiful ; on that tongue, between the city and the sea, are numerous low windmills, which, as I first saw them in the dusk of evening, made me think that Don Quixote needed not to have been so very mad to mistake them for giants. As I looked on the narrow streets of the town, and the low and small houses with shoots throwing the rain-water into the middle of the street, the thought more than once occurred to me, that probably in the times of good Queen Bess the streets of London presented a somewhat similar appearance. The windows are also doors, and every house has its balcony, on which, when it is in the shade, the occupants spend much time. The intrigues of which the Spanish plays and romances are full, are facilitated by the architecture—it being equally easy to get access by the windows and escape from the roof. The beggars are charmingly picturesque, and have in their rags a virtuosity worthy a nation whose most characteristic literature consists of beggar-romances.

H. C. R. TO T. R.

In the evening about seven all is life and activity. The streets are crowded, especially those towards the bay, and it is at this time that if everybody had a wishing-cap all the world would fly to Spain for two or three hours. The beauty of the evenings is indescribable. There is a voluptuous feeling in the atmosphere, which diffuses joy, so that a man need not think to be happy. There is a physical felicity, which renders it superfluous to seek any other. And when we add the languor produced by the heat in the middle of the day (which, however, I have not felt so much as I expected), we can account for the indolence of the Spanish character.

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

H. C. R.'s work at Corunna.

My business was to collect news and forward it by every vessel that left the port,* and I spent the time

* My letters to the Times are dated "Shores of the Bay of Biscay" and "Corunna." The first appeared on August 9, 1808; the last on January 26, 1809.

An extract from Mr. Robinson's first communication, dated August 2, will show the high spirits and the favourable prospects which animated the Spanish people at the time of his arrival. "When we consider, as is officially stated, that not a Frenchman exists in all Andalusia, save in bonds; that in Portugal, Junot remains in a state of siege; that all the South of Spain is free; and that in the North the late victories of the patriots in Arragon have broken the communication between the French forces in Biscay and Catalonia, we need not fear the speedy emancipation of the capital, and the compression of the French force within the provinces adjoining Bayonne. When this arrives it will be seen whether the long-suffering of the powers of the North, as well as of the whole French people, may not find an end, and whether thus at length a period may not be put to that tyranny which seemed so firmly established."

The next communication (August 4) announced the surrender of Dupont's army; and the third (on August 8) the flight of Joseph Napoleon from Madrid.

On September 26, Mr. Robinson writes: "The glorious and astonishing exertions of the Spanish Patriots, of which it is more correct to say that the Spaniards became soldiers in performing them, than that they performed them because they were soldiers, ended in the capture or destruction of the greater part of the numerous forces which had penetrated the interior of the country, while the few that could effect their escape were driven to the Northern provinces."

between the reception and transmission of intelligence in translating the public documents and in writing comments. I was anxious to conceal the nature of my occupation, but I found it necessary from time to time to take some friends into my confidence.

Chap. XII.

1808.

Acquaintances at Corunna.

Among the earliest and latest of my Corunna acquaintance were the officers of the Defiance. I became especially intimate with Lieutenants Stiles and Banks, and Midshipman Drake. They seemed to have more than a brother's love for each other. This perhaps is the natural consequence where, as in this instance, each felt that in the hour of danger he might owe his life to his companions. I at length imagined I could be happy on shipboard. These young men and I rendered each other mutual service. My lodgings were frequently their home, and they assisted me in the transmission of letters. I introduced them to partners at balls, and gained credit with the ladies for so doing.

Tertulias.

There were several houses at which I used to visit; occasionally I was invited to a formal Tertulia. At these Tertulias the ladies sit with their backs against the wall on an elevated floor, such as we see in old halls. The gentlemen sit before them, each cavalier on a very small straw-bottomed chair before his dama, and often with his guitar, on which he klimpers, and by aid of which, if report say truly, he can make love without being detected. The company being seated, a large silver plate is given to each guest, and first a cup of rich and most delicious chocolate is taken—then, to correct it, a pint tumbler of cold water. Preserved fruits and other sweetmeats follow in abundance, and these in their turn are corrected by a second pint of water. Nothing can exceed the dulness of these parties, but I found them useful as lessons in Spanish. It was not till October that I had admission to the tables of the Spanish gentry. I dined usually at the Fontana d'Oro, the chief hotel, where the dinners were the worst I was ever condemned to sit down to—the meat bad, and rendered intolerable by garlic. The only excellent meat was the Spanish ham, cured with sugar; and the only dish for an epicure was the olla podrida, a medley to be compared with, though differing from, a Yorkshire pie.

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

Hotel dinners.

Captain Kennedy.

Among my earliest English acquaintance was a Captain Kennedy, who filled the office of Minister to the Galician Junta. We became well acquainted, and were of use to each other. He sang charmingly, and was a very handsome man; his mother was the famous Mrs. Kennedy, the actress.

Arrival of English troops.

On the 13th of October the first of a series of events took place, which mark one of the most memorable periods of my life. On that day there arrived a detachment of English troops under the command of Sir David Baird. Luckily for myself, I had a few days before become acquainted with General Brodrick, and he had introduced me to Admiral de Courcy, who was stationed in the Tonnant, a ship of the line. Captain Hancock and I had received an invitation to dine with the Admiral this day. In the morning, when I was over my books, I was startled by the report of cannon, and, running to the ramparts, beheld more than 150 vessels, transports, sailing in a double row before a gentle breeze. It was a striking spectacle, and I felt proud of it. But I remarked that the sight was rather mortifying than gratifying to the pride of some of the Spanish gentry, who were looking on, and who might feel humiliated that their country needed such aid.* We had dined, when, on a sudden, the Admiral rose and cried out, "Gentlemen! open your quarters;" on our doing which an officer placed himself between each two of us. Among the arrivals were Sir David Baird, General Crawford, &c. We had half an hour's formal chat, and drank success to the expedition. After remaining a few days in Corunna the troops proceeded to the interior, to join the army under Sir John Moore. The expedition, I have understood, was ill-planned; the result belongs to the history of the war.

Sir David Baird.

General Crawford.

On the 20th there was an arrival which, more than that of the English, ought to have gratified the Spaniards. I witnessed a procession from the coast to the Townhall, of which the two leading figures were the Spanish General Romana and the English Minister, Mr. Frere. Few incidents in the great war against Napoleon can be referred to as rivalling in romantic interest the escape of the Spanish soldiers under General Romana from the North of Germany; but, on beholding the hero, my enthusiasm subsided. Romana looked, in my eyes, like a Spanish barber. I was therefore less surprised and General Romana.

* Mr. Robinson says in his letter of the 22nd of October: "In one respect I was almost pleased to remark the indifference of our reception—they do not want us, thought I, tant mieux! and God grant they may not find themselves mistaken! There is great confidence on the part of the people; they have no idea, apparently, that it is possible for them to be beaten; their rage is unbounded when the name of Buonaparte is mentioned; but their hatred of the French is mixed with contempt."

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

vexed than others were when, in the course of events, he showed himself to be an ordinary character, having no just sense of what the times and the situation required from the Spanish nation. On the other hand, I received a favourable impression from the person and address of Mr. Frere. And when, in a few months, the public voice in England was raised against him as the injudicious counsellor who imperilled the English army by advising their advance on Madrid, my own feeling was that he was unjustly treated.

Mr. Frere.

Madame Mosquera.

On November 3rd there was an arrival from England, which was to me a source of some amusement. Early in the morning a servant from my friend Madame Mosquera* came in great haste to request that I would go to her immediately. I found her full of bustle and anxiety. "There is just arrived," said she, "an English grandeza—a lord and lady of high rank. They will dine on board their ship, and come here in the evening. All the arrangements are made: I am to attend them in a carriage on shore, and the Duke of Veraguas is to accompany me; and there must be a second gentleman, and we hope you will go with us. They are to take a refresco here, and to-morrow they are to dine with the Countess Bianci. You are to be invited to be at the dinner; and what I want of you now is that you instruct me how I am to receive my lord and lady." My first inquiry was who these great persons were. No other than my Lord and Lady Holland. My determination was at once taken. I told Madame that it was impossible for me to attend her on shore; I was not of noble birth, nor a fit companion for the descendant and representative of Columbus. Colonel Kennedy, by birth no better than myself, was, in virtue of his diplomatic position, the first Englishman at Corunna, and must therefore be invited. (Poor Kennedy received his invitation, and when he heard that he owed to me the honour, he declared he would never forgive me, for he and the Duke and the Baroness were made to sit in the carriage between three and four hours waiting for the mistress of Holland House.) As to the reception, I said, you have only to do for them what you would do for the Spanish grandees of the first rank—and besides the usual chocolate and sweetmeats, send up tea and bread-and-butter. That there might be no mistake I requested a loaf to be brought, and I actually cut a couple of slices as thin as wafers, directing that a plate should be filled with such. The tea equipage I was assured was excellent—procured in London. I said there would be no impropriety in my meeting my lord and lady at the house, and therefore promised to attend. After a wearisome waiting on our part, the noble visitors and their escort arrived.

Preparation for a grand reception.

* Mr. Robinson sometimes spells this name Moschera.

Lord and Lady Holland.

Lady Holland, with her stately figure and grand demeanour; my lord, with his countenance of bonhommie and intelligence; a lad, said to be the second son of the Duke of Bedford, a Lord Something Russell—perhaps the present Prime Minister* of England; and a gentleman whom I have heard called satirically Lady Holland's atheist, a Mr. Allen, but better known as an elegant scholar and Edinburgh reviewer, who in

* This was written in 1848.

CHAP. XII. — 1808.

that character fell into a scrape by abusing some Greek that was by Pindar. The party was a small one. In a few minutes after the arrival of the guests the refresco was brought in. All the servants were in gala dresses, and a table being set out in the large reception-room, a portly man brought in a huge silver salver, resembling in size the charger on which in Italian pictures the head of John the Baptist is usually brought by Herod's step-daughter. This huge silver dish was piled up with great pieces of bread-and-butter an inch thick, sufficient to feed Westminster School. This was set down with great solemnity. Next came a large tea-tray of green and red tin, such as might have been picked up at Wapping. This was covered with all sorts of indescribable earthenware. The teapot, which was of tin, had probably not been in use for years, and therefore the moment Madame Mosquera took hold of it to pour out the tea, the lid fell in and filled the room with steam. She managed to pour out a cup, which she ran with to my lady, who good-naturedly accepted it. This done, she ran with another cup to Lord Holland. She was full of zeal, and her little round figure perspired with joy and gladness. Mosquera saw the ridicule of the exhibition and tried to keep her back, twitching her gown and whispering audibly, "Molly, you are mad!" She, however, ran to me full of glee, "Have not I done well?" The gentlemen were glad to inquire of us, the residents, the news of the day. Lord Holland was known to be among the warmest friends of the Spanish cause; in that respect differing from the policy of his Whig friends, who by nothing so much estranged me from their party as by their endeavour to force the English Government to abandon the Spanish patriots.

Party at Madame Mosquera's.

Madame Lavaggi.

Before the events occurred which precipitated the departure of us all, I had made the acquaintance of one highly interesting and remarkable woman. This was Madame Lavaggi. Her husband was the Treasurer of the kingdom, that is of Galicia. He owed his place, and indeed everything, to her—he was younger than she, and a well-looking man. She was one of the plainest women I ever saw,—I should say the very plainest. The fortune was hers, and she took the lead in all things. She had character and energy, and I felt more interest in her conversation than in that of any other person. But she was altogether uneducated. She spoke French very ill, and could hardly write—for instance, in a short note she spelt quand, cant—but her zeal against the French rendered her eloquent, almost poetical. She was very religious, and loyal without being insensible to the abuses of the Government. Her father had been Prime Minister under Charles VI., and she was fond of relating that at one time six portfolios or seals of office were held by him. At her house I was a frequent and favoured guest, and I was able to return these civilities by substantial services.

Plan for going to Madrid.

The time was approaching when these services would be wanted. Before this occurred, however, I determined on taking a holiday, and having made the acquaintance of Murphy, the architect who wrote a book on "The Gothic Architecture of Portugal," proposed that we should go together to Madrid; he agreed to this, and went to buy a carriage for our journey, but returned with the information, which was a great secret, that it was not advisable to advance, for the English army was on its retreat! This was on November 22nd.*

CHAP. XII.
1808.

Anxiety about personal safety.

As the intelligence became daily worse in December, others were led to consider how their personal safety might be secured, and left the place. This was the means of increasing my intimacy with the Lavaggis and the English officers in authority; I became known also to some of the Spaniards in office, including members of the Junta—that is, the Galician Government, which collectively had the quality of Majesty in formal addresses.

* In his letter of November 12th, Mr. Robinson says: "My last letter, which was of the 9th, imparted to you the anxious feelings with which I was impressed when I wrote it. You learned from it that the campaign was opened by an attack on several parts of the Spanish line by the French; and you were informed that those attacks had been successful."

"November 25th.—The intelligence brought by the Lady Pellew packet from Corunna is of an unfavourable complexion, yet such as we might perhaps have expected from the first appearance of Buonaparte upon the theatre of war. General Blake's army, after sustaining repeated attacks, is said at last to have been completely defeated, while the advanced body of the French have even reached Valladolid.

"The news from the English army on its way from Portugal is no less distressing. It is said that 3,000 of the men under Sir John Moore are sick."

"Corunna, December 8th.—A serious responsibility is incurred by that Government, whichever it was, to which the lamentable delay is to be imputed, which followed the arrival of those troops in the harbour of Corunna. The utter want of all preparations for promoting the march of that army was seen with deep affliction by both British and Spaniards. No man pretends to fix the culpability upon any one; they can only judge of those who are privy to the negotiations which preceded the expedition. The sad effect, however, is very obvious; for but for this delay the united British army would not have been compelled to retreat before the foe, leaving him a vast reach of territory at his command."

"December 10th.—A tale is current which, if not true, has been invented by an Arragonese, that Buonaparte has sworn that on the 1st of January his brother shall be at Madrid, Marshal Bessieres at Lisbon, and himself at Saragossa."

Arguelles.

I was repeatedly in the company of Arguelles, the famous statesman and orator, whose person and manners inspired me with greater respect that those of any other Spaniard.

Spanish language.

In the midst of these troubles I was learning the language rapidly, and was able to read Spanish books; and before the close of the year I found myself able to take interest in general society. But, excepting Madame Lavaggi, there was not a woman who appeared to have any intelligence or strength of mind, though all were warm patriots. There were several agreeable women, but only one to be conversed with except on balls and operas. When I received from England the famous pamphlet of Cevallos, which first exposed to Europe the infamous treatment of the Spanish princes by Buonaparte, I carried it to a Spanish lady who spoke French; she looked at the title gravely, and returned it saying, "I never look into any book that is not given me by my confessor." The ordinary conversation of the ladies was frivolous and undignified, but innocent, and their indelicacies were quite unconscious. Every Spanish woman is christened Mary, and to this there is some addition by which they are generally known. I was puzzled at hearing a very lively laughing girl called "Dolores," but was told she was christened Maria de los Dolores—the Mother of Sorrows. One other was always called "Conche;" that I found to be an abridgment of Conception—Maria de la Concepçion being her proper name.

Spanish ladies.

Staying on at Corunna.

I had till the very last leisure to amuse myself occasionally both with books and society, but as the year drew to a close the general anxiety and trouble augmented; and before it was at an end I confidently anticipated the result, though I felt bound in honour to remain at my post till the last; and from the number of my acquaintance among the English officers and diplomatists, I felt no apprehension of being abandoned.*

Chap. xii. 1808.

1809.

My notes are too few to enable me to give a precise date to some of the more interesting and notable occurrences of this year. Several of these have a bearing on the morale of public men, but I would not insert them here if I were not perfectly sure of the substantial correctness of what I relate.

Mismanagement.

This I must state as the general impression and result—that in the economical department of our campaign in Spain there was great waste and mismanagement, amounting to dishonesty. One day ——— came to me full of glee, and said, "I have done a good day's work: I have put £50 in my pocket. C—— [who was one of the Commissariat] wanted to buy some [I am not sure of the commodity]. He is bound not to make the purchase himself, so he told me where I could get it and what I was to give, and I have £50 for my commission." On my expressing surprise, he said, "Oh, it is always done in all purchases."

Another occurrence, not dishonourable in this way,

* On December 23rd, Mr. Robinson says: "A letter from Salamanca announced that Joseph, the Usurper, is at Madrid, and issues his mandates as if Spain were already conquered, though no one obeys him."

but still greatly to be regretted, must be imputed, I fear, to a very honourable man. Only a very few days before the actual embarkation of the troops, there arrived from England a cargo of clothing—a gift from English philanthropists (probably a large proportion of them Quakers) to the Spanish soldiers. The Supercargo spoke to me on his arrival, and I told him he must on no account unload—that every hour brought fugitives—that the transports were collected for the troops, which were in full retreat—and that if these articles were landed they would become, of course, the prey of the French. He said he would consult General Brodrick. I saw the Supercargo next day, and he told me that the General had said that the safest thing for him to do was to carry out his instructions literally—land the clothes, get a receipt, and then whatever happened he was not to blame. And he acted accordingly.*

Official timidity.

* In a letter to the Times, January 6th, Mr. Robinson writes: "Within a single day everything has changed its appearance in this place; and both English and Spanish seem to be seriously alarmed, not for the fate of the country alone, or even the province, but of the town and themselves.

"On whichever side we look, we see cause for distress; the enemy advancing in the front, Portugal abandoned to the right, the Asturias defenceless to the left; and in the distance, uncertainty and obscurity."

"January 8th.—The peril is drawing nigh, and the apprehensions and fears of the unmilitary are therefore increased; but the danger is now unequivocally perceived, and people begin to meet it manfully. As a public expression of the sense of our situation, the theatre is this evening shut for the first time."

"There is a strong sentiment in favour of the English troops, notwithstanding their retreat. This has relieved our minds from a great embarrassment. A Spanish populace, especially the female half of it, is no despicable power; and it was apprehended by some, that in case the English were unsuccessful, the people might rise in favour of the French. Hitherto, the contrary is apparent. I have once or twice heard exclamations from the women which seem to tend to a disturbance, exclaiming against the traitors, who had sent for the English to be massacred, and then abandoned them."

"During the day there has been a number of arrivals. Our streets swarm,

CHAP. XII.
—
1809.

H. C. R. assists Lavaggi.

Some weeks before the actual embarkation Lavaggi applied to me for assistance in placing in security the papers and accounts belonging to Galicia, and held by him as Treasurer. He could not let it be known that he was about to run away, and therefore requested me to purchase the charter-party of one of the merchant vessels lying in the harbour. This I effected. There was a vessel laden with a sort of beans called caravanzes, the property of a well-known character, one Captain Ashe, who held the charter-party. He became afterwards notorious as author of "The Book" about the Queen of George IV., which was the subject of so many rumours, and ultimately suppressed. In the transaction with Captain Ashe I took care to have all the legal documents. When the cargo was discharged at Plymouth, caravanzes were so high in price that all the expense of the voyage to England, which was not contemplated, was defrayed. The ship was chartered to Cadiz, to which place we were bound. I was the legal owner, and as such passed to and fro.

On January 11th a number of troops arrived, and it was announced that the French were near. During this time the Spaniards did not conceal their indignation at as a few weeks since, with English officers; but the gaiety and splendour which graced their first entrance into Spain have given way to a mien and air certainly more congenial with the horrid business of war. I do not mean that they manifest any unworthy or dishonourable sentiment: on the contrary, as far as I can judge from the flying testimony of those I converse with, the army has throughout endured with patience its privations and long suffering; and, since its arduous and difficult retreat, displayed an honourable constancy and valour. They speak with little satisfaction of all that they have seen in Spain, and I fear are hardly just towards the people whom they came to protect and rescue."

The French approaching Corunna.

the retreat. It was affirmed, with what truth I had not the means of judging, that there were many passes capable of defence, and that the enemy might have been easily stopped. Why this easy task was not undertaken by General Romana was never explained to me. But I certainly heard from the retreating officers themselves that the retreat was more properly a flight, and that it was conducted very blunderingly and with precipitation. I was assured that cannon were brought away, while barrels of dollars were thrown down precipices ; and I witnessed the ragged and deplorable condition of officers. One day, going over to my ship, there was a common sailor, as he seemed, most indecently ragged, who was going to a transport vessel near mine. I began joking with "my lad," when he turned round, and I at once perceived in the elegance of his figure and the dignity of his countenance that I was addressing one of the young aristocracy. He received my apologies very good-humouredly ; told me that he had been subject to every privation, and that he had on his flight been thankful for a crust of bread and a pair of old shoes. On board a transport he had a wardrobe awaiting him.*

As the time of departure approached, the interest of

* In the letter to the Times dated January 11th, Mr. Robinson says : " In the course of this day the whole English army has either entered within, or planted itself before, the walls of this town. The French army will not fail to be quick in the pursuit ; and as the transports which were so anxiously expected from Vigo are still out of sight, and, according to the state of the wind, not likely soon to make their appearance, this spot will most probably become the scene of a furious and bloody contest.

"The late arrivals have, of course, made us far better acquainted than we possibly could be before with the circumstances of this laborious and dis-

CHAP. XII.
—
1809.

Don Padre Gil.

Lavaggi in the ship became known, and on the 11th, one of the Junta, Don Padre Gil, came to me in great distress, imploring me to take him on board. He would die, he said, rather than submit to the French. I let him come to me a second time, having obtained permission to take him on board. By way of trial, I asked him if he knew what it was to become an exile. "Oh, yes; I have a brother in America and friends at Cadiz."—"But have you supplied yourself with the means of living abroad and supporting yourself on the voyage?"—"Oh, yes; I have plenty of chocolate." The man at last actually went down upon his knees to me. This was irresistible—I took him, but did not scruple to try his feelings; for I made him in the evening put on a sailor's jacket, and take a portmanteau on his head. I could command the sentinels to open the gates of the town, which he could not. He went on board, but next day he was fetched away by another member of the Junta, a priest named Garcia, a subtle if not an able man. A few weeks afterwards I read in the French papers a flaming address from the inhabitants of Corunna, gratefully thanking the French General for having emancipated them from their oppressors and tyrants the English, and the very honourable campaign, which has had all the suffering, without any of the honours of war. Without a single general engagement—having to fight an enemy who always shunned the contest—it is supposed that our army has lost upwards of 3,000 men, a larger number of whom perished by the usual causes, as well as labours of a retreating soldiery."

"January 12*th*.—An alarming symptom is the extreme scarcity of every kind of provisions. The shops are shut—the markets are abandoned. Perhaps the imperious wants of future importunate visitors are especially recollected. If the transports arrive, there will be abundance of every necessity; if not, famine stares us in the face."

first name among the list of subscribers was that of Padre Gil.

Madame Lavaggi.

It was on the 13th that I took on board Madame Lavaggi and a handsome and amiable young officer, a native of America, named T——, a relation of the Duke of Veraguas. There were on board Lavaggi, Pyecroft, a gentleman named Pipiela, with his wife, servants of course, and, as I afterwards learned, others of whom I had no knowledge. Madame Lavaggi I heard was very ill during the night, and next day her husband gave orders that we should return, in order that she might be taken on shore. It was not until afterwards that I discovered the real cause of our going back was that Madame had found out that their young friend T—— had smuggled on board some one who had no right to be there; she therefore determined on quitting the vessel. I accompanied her to her house, and as we approached the door a rich perfume of cedar-wood was apparent—it proceeded from the burning of a costly cabinet which she much prized. The destruction of this and other valuable articles of furniture had not been prevented by the officers who were left in the house, and the poor lady burst into tears as she told me that these gentlemen had been most hospitably treated at her table.*

* Letter to the Times, January 15th. "The last two days have materially changed the appearance of things. Yesterday evening, the fleet of transports, which had been dispersed in their passage from Vigo, began to enter the harbour, and the hearts of thousands were relieved by the prospect of deliverance. I beheld this evening the beautiful bay covered with our vessels, both armed and mercantile, and I should have thought the noble three-deckers, which stood on the outside of the harbour, a proud spectacle, if I could have forgotten the inglorious service they were called to perform."

CHAP. XII.
—
1809.

The English leaving Corunna.

I slept in my old lodging, and the morning of the 16th I spent in making calls and in writing the last letter to the Times. The whole town was in commotion,—the English hurrying away, at least those of them who were not engaged in protecting the embarkation of the others,—the Spaniards looking on in a sort of gloomy anger, neither aiding nor opposing them. On going to dine at the hotel I found the table-d'hôte filled with English officers. After a time, on looking round I saw that the room was nearly empty—not a red-coat to be seen. On inquiry of the waiters, one said, "Have you not heard? The French are come: they are fighting."* Having finished my dinner, I walked out of the town. Townspeople, stragglers, were walking and loitering on the high road and in the fields. We could hear firing at a distance. Several carts came in with wounded soldiers. I noticed several French prisoners, whose countenances expressed rather rage and menaces than fear. They knew very well what would take place. I walked with some acquaintances a mile or more out of the town, and remained there till dark—long enough to know that the enemy was driven back; for the firing evidently came from a greater distance. Having taken leave of Madame Lavaggi, whom I sincerely esteemed, and of my few acquaintances in the town, I went on board, and our vessel was judiciously stationed by the Captain out of the harbour, but immediately on the outside. There were numerous ships like ours sailing about the bay. The Captain said to me over night, "You may be sure the French will be here in the morning; I will take care to place the vessel so that we may have no difficulty in making our escape." The morning was fine and the wind favourable, or our position might have been perilous. Early in the forenoon my attention was drawn to the sound of musketry, and by a glance it could be ascertained that the soldiers were shooting such of their fine horses as could not be taken on board. This was done, of course, to prevent their strengthening the French cavalry. One very loud explosion brought us all on deck. There was on the shore a large powder magazine, which had been often the boundary of my walk. When the cloud of smoke which had been raised was blown away, there was empty space where there had been a solid building a few moments before; but this was a less exciting noise than when, about one o'clock, we heard a cannonading from the shore at the inland extremity of the bay. It was the French army. They were firing on ships which were quietly waiting for orders. I remarked the sudden movement in the bay—the ships before lying at anchor were instantly in motion. I myself noticed three vessels which had lost their bowsprits. The Captain told me that twelve had cut their cables. We were not anxious to quit the spot, and therefore sailed about in the vicinity all night. Two vessels were on fire, and next day I was shocked at beholding the remains of a wreck, and the glee with which our sailors tried to fish them up as we passed. Lavaggi was very desirous to go to Cadiz, but the Captain solemnly declared that the ship was not seaworthy for that course, the wind being direct for England; he would not risk our lives by attempting it. Of course, as we could not disprove his assertion, we submitted, and proceeded straight to Falmouth, which we reached on the 23rd.

* This was the celebrated battle of Corunna, at which Sir John Moore was killed. In Mr. Robinson's memoranda, written at the time, he says that the cannonading seemed to be on the hills about three miles from the town. At five o'clock he embarked, and though the vessel remained not far off till the 18th, he does not appear to have heard of the death of the English commander, or any particulars of the battle.

In the bay of Corunna.

Chap. XII. — 1809.

Return to London.

On my return to London I resumed my occupation at the Times office. But a change had taken place there; Collier had transferred his services to the Chronicle. In the meanwhile I had less given me to do, but I did it with cheerfulness, and soon renewed my old habits and old acquaintance.

Spanish political agents.

At this time, too, I was frequent in my calls on the Spanish political agents. The names of Durango, Lobo, and Abeilla appear in my pocket-book. I rendered a service to Southey by making him acquainted with the last named, who supplied him with important documents for his history of the Spanish war.

At Mrs. Buller's.

On the 13th of July I was invited to a small party at Mrs. Buller's. There were not above half a dozen gentlemen. Mrs. Buller told me, before the arrival of Horace Twiss, that some of her friends had heard of his imitations of the great orators, and that he was to exhibit. The company being assembled, he was requested to make a speech in the style of Mr. Pitt or Mr. Fox, as he had done at Lady Cork's. Twiss was modest, not to say bashful—he could not do such a thing unless excited; but if Mr. Mallett or Mr.

Horace Twiss.

Robinson would make a speech on any subject, he would immediately reply. Unfortunately, both Mr. Mallett and Mr. Robinson were modest too, and their modesty was inflexible. At length, a table being set in the doorway between the two drawing-rooms, the orator was so placed that a profile or oblique view was had of his face in both rooms, and he began: "Mr. Speaker!" and we had two speeches in succession, in imitation of Fox and Pitt—I think on the subject of Irish union, or it might be Catholic emancipation. I have forgotten all but the fact that the lady who sat next to me said, "Oh, the advantages you gentlemen have!—I never before knew the power of human oratory." Human oratory I will swear to.

H. C. R.'s engagement in connection with the Times ceases.

On the 12th of August I received a letter from Mr. Walter, informing me that he had no longer need of my services, and on the 29th of September I formally laid down my office of Foreign Editor of the Times. I left Mr. Walter on very good terms; he had a kindly feeling towards me, and his conduct had been uniformly friendly and respectful. He had never treated me as one who received his wages, and at his table no one could have guessed our relation to each other. On two occasions he wished me to undertake duties which are only confided to trustworthy friends. Let me here bear my testimony to his character. He may not have fixed his standard at the highest point, but he endeavoured to conform to it.

This is the proper place for me to mention two persons connected with the Times while I wrote for

CHAP. XII. — 1809.

Peter Fraser.

it. The writer of the great leaders—the flash articles which made a noise—was Peter Fraser, then a Fellow of Corpus Christi, Cambridge, afterwards Rector of Kegworth, in Leicestershire. He used to sit in Walter's parlour and write his articles after dinner. He was never made known as editor or writer, and would probably have thought it a degradation; but he was prime adviser and friend, and continued to write long after I had ceased to do so. He was a man of general ability, and when engaged for the Times was a powerful writer. The only man who in a certain vehemence of declamation equalled, or perhaps surpassed him, was the author of the papers signed "Vetus"—that is Sterling, the father of the younger Sterling, the free-thinking clergyman, whose remains Julius Hare has published.

Sterling.

W. Combe.

There is another person belonging to this period, who is a character certainly worth writing about; indeed I have known few to be compared with him. It was on my first acquaintance with Walter that I used to notice in his parlour a remarkably fine old gentleman. He was tall, with a stately figure and handsome face. He did not appear to work much with the pen, but was chiefly a consulting man. When Walter was away he used to be more at the office, and to decide in the dernier ressort. His name was W. Combe. It was not till after I had left the office that I learned what I shall now relate. At this time and until the end of his life he was an inhabitant of the King's Bench Prison, and when he came to Printing-House Square it was only by virtue of a day rule.

I believe that Walter offered to release him from prison by paying his debts. This he would not permit, as he did not acknowledge the equity of the claim for which he suffered imprisonment. He preferred living on an allowance from Walter, and was, he said, perfectly happy. He used to be attended by a young man who was a sort of half-servant, half-companion. Combe had been for many years of his life a man of letters, and wrote books anonymously. Some of these acquired a great temporary popularity. One at least, utterly worthless, was for a time, by the aid of prints as worthless as the text, to be seen everywhere—now only in old circulating libraries. This is "The Travels of Dr. Syntax in search of the Picturesque." It is a long poem in eight-line verse; in external form something between Prior and Hudibras, but in merit with no real affinity to either. Combe wrote novels; one I recollect reading with amusement—the "German Gil Blas." He was also the author of the famous "Letters of a Nobleman to his Son," generally ascribed to Lord Lyttelton. Amyot told me that he heard Windham speak of him. "I shall always have a kindness for old Combe," said Windham, "for he was the first man that ever praised me, and when praise was therefore worth having." That was in "Lord Lyttelton's Letters." Combe had, as I have said, the exterior of a gentleman. I understand that he was a man of fortune when young, and travelled in Europe, and even made a journey with Sterne; that he ran through his fortune, and took to literature, when "house and land were gone and spent," and when his high connections ceased to be of service. Of these connections, and of the adventures of his youth, he was very fond of talking, and I used to enjoy the anecdotes he told after dinner, until one day, when he had been very communicative, and I had sucked in all he related with greedy ear, Fraser said, laughing, to Walter, "Robinson, you see, is quite a flat; he believes all old Combe says."—"I believe whatever a gentleman says till I have some reason to the contrary."—"Well, then," said Fraser, "you must believe nothing he says that is about himself. What he relates is often true, except that he makes himself the doer. He gives us well-known anecdotes, and only transfers the action to himself." This, of course, was a sad interruption to my pleasure. I might otherwise have enriched these reminiscences with valuable facts about Sterne, Johnson, Garrick, Mrs. Siddons, and other worthies of the last generation.

Dr. Syntax.

Chap. xii. 1809.

Combe's Anecdotes.

This infirmity of old Combe was quite notorious. Amyot related to me a curious story which he heard from Dr. Parr. The Doctor was at a large dinner-party when Combe gave a very pleasant and interesting account of his building a well-known house on Keswick Lake; he went very much into details, till at last the patience of one of the party was exhausted, and he cried out, "Why, what an impudent fellow you are! You have given a very true and capital account of the house, and I wonder how you learned it; but that house was built by my father; it was never out of the family, and is in my own possession at this moment." Combe was not in the least abashed, but answered, with the greatest nonchalance, "I am obliged to you for doing justice to the fidelity of my description; I have no doubt it is your property, and I hope you will live long to enjoy it."

H. C. R. writes for the London Review.

The first occasion of my appearing in my own name as an author was about this time. Tipper, who estimated my talents as a writer by my reputation as a speaker, solicited me to become a collaborateur, under Cumberland, the well-known dramatist, in getting up a new Review, called the London Review, of which the distinguishing feature was to be that each writer should put his name to the article. I was flattered by the application, and readily consented. Four half-crown quarterly numbers were published. I dined once at Tipper's with Cumberland, and thought him a gentlemanly amiable man, but did not form a high opinion of his abilities; and I thought the less of him because he professed so much admiration of my single article as to direct it to be placed first in the number. This was a review of the great pamphlet on the "Convention of Cintra," by Wordsworth. The only valuable portion of the article was a translation of Arndt's "Geist der Zeit," which treated of the Spanish character, and predicted that the Spaniards would be the first to resist the tyranny of Buonaparte.

Keeping Terms.

In November I began keeping my terms at Middle Temple Hall, but was unable to make up my mind to study the Law seriously, as I ought at once to have done. One of my severest self-reproaches is that I did not, without delay, immediately become the pupil of some pleader. It needed a special inducement for that; and all I did was merely to keep a term. On November 18th I ate my first dinner, having deposited my £100 with the Treasurer. I entered the beautiful hall with an oppressive sense of shame, and wished to hide myself as if I were an intruder. I was conscious of being too old to commence the study of Law with any probability of success. My feelings, however, were much relieved by seeing William Quayle in the hall. He very good-naturedly found a place for me at his mess. But this dining at mess was so unpleasant that, in keeping the twelve terms required, I doubt whether I took a single superfluous dinner, although these would only have cost 6d. each.

CHAP. XII. — 1809.

Walk to Royston.

On the 23rd of December Mr. Rutt, his nephew George Wedd, and myself walked to Royston. There was a remarkable gradation of age among us. We were on a visit to Mr. Nash, who was fifteen years older than Mr. Rutt, who was fifteen years older than myself, and I was in my thirty-fourth year, and fifteen years older than George Wedd. Mr. Rutt and I were proud of our feat—a walk of thirty-eight miles! But old

Mr. Wedd.

Mr. Wedd, the father of George, was displeased with his son. He was a country gentleman, proud of his horses, and conscious of being a good rider. I was told that he disliked me, and would not invite me to his house. I offered a wager that I would gain his goodwill. After dinner we talked of books; Mr. Wedd detested books and the quoters of books; but I persisted, and praised Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and illustrated the beauty of his writing by citing that wise and fine saying of his,

"A fine man upon a fine horse is the noblest object on earth for God to look down upon." Mr. Wedd declared that he never thought Mr. Robinson could make himself so agreeable, and I was invited to his house.

CHAPTER XIII.

1810.

I remained all the spring and summer in London, with the exception of making short journeys; and spent my time at Collier's, keeping up all my old visiting acquaintance and making new. I became more intimate with Godwin, who was keeping a bookseller's shop in his wife's name. I now and then saw interesting persons at his house; indeed, I saw none but remarkable persons there. Among the most remarkable was the great Irish orator, Curran. His talk was rich in idiom and imagery, and in warmth of feeling. He was all passion—fierce in his dislikes, and not sparing in the freedom of his language even of those with whom he was on familiar terms. One evening, walking from Godwin's house, he said of a friend, "She is a pustule of vanity." He was not so violent in his politics. The short ministry of the Whigs had had the good effect of softening the political prejudices of most of us, though not of all the old Jacobins, as is shown by a speech made by Anne Plumptre, the translator of Kotzebue, whom I met at a dinner-party at Gamaliel Lloyd's. She said, "People are talking about an invasion—I am not afraid of an invasion; I believe the country would be all the happier if Buonaparte were to effect a landing and overturn the Government. He would destroy the Church and the aristocracy, and his government would be better than the one we have."

Godwin.

Curran.

Anne Plumptre.

Blake.

I amused myself this spring by writing an account of the insane poet, painter, and engraver, Blake. Perthes of Hamburg had written to me asking me to send him an article for a new German magazine, entitled "Vaterländische Annalen," which he was about to set up. Dr. Malkin having in the memoirs of his son given an account of Blake's extraordinary genius, with specimens of his poems, I resolved out of these materials to compile a paper. This I did, and it was translated into German by Dr. Julius, who many years afterwards introduced himself to me as my translator. The article appears in the single number of the second volume of the "Vaterländische Annalen." For it was at this time that Buonaparte united Hamburg to the French empire, on which Perthes manfully gave up the magazine, saying, as he had no longer a "Vaterland," there could be no "Vaterländische Annalen." But before I drew up this paper I went to see a gallery of Blake's paintings, which were exhibited by his brother, a hosier in Carnaby Market. The entrance fee was 2*s.* 6*d., catalogue included. I was deeply interested by the catalogue as well as the pictures. I took four copies, telling the brother I hoped he would let me come again. He said, "Oh! as often as you please." I afterwards became acquainted with Blake, but will postpone what I have to relate of this extraordinary character.

H. C. R.'s paper on Blake.

Ayrton.

In the June of this year I made the acquaintance of Ayrton, with whom I was intimate for many years; and

* This visit is referred to in Gilchrist's "Life of Blake." Vol. i., p. 226.

CHAP. XIII. — 1810.

Captain Burney.

soon afterwards the name of his friend Captain Burney occurs in my notes. They lived near each other, in Little James Street, Pimlico. I used to be invited to the Captain's whist parties, of which dear Lamb was the chief ornament. The Captain was himself a character, a fine, noble creature—gentle, with a rough exterior, as became the associate of Captain Cook in his voyages round the world, and the literary historian of all these acts of circumnavigation. Here used to be Hazlitt, till he affronted the Captain by severe criticisms on the works of his sister Madame D'Arblay. Another frequenter of these delightful whist parties was Rickman, the Speaker's secretary, and who then invited me to his house. Rickman's clerk Phillips and others used also to be present.

Serjeant Rough.

It was in the course of this summer that my friend Mrs. Charles Aikin invited me to meet Serjeant Rough at dinner. We became intimate at once. I ought to have made his acquaintance before, for when I was at Weimar in 1805 Miss Flaxman, then a governess in the family of Mr. Hare Naylor, gave me a letter of introduction to him. His wife, a daughter of John Wilkes, was a woman of some talents and taste, who could make herself attractive.

Miss Wordsworth.

During a visit I made to Bury about this time, Miss Wordsworth was staying with the Clarksons; I brought her up to London, and left her at the Lambs'.

MISS WORDSWORTH TO H. C. R.

Grasmere, Nov. 6th, 1810.

My dear Sir,

I am very proud of a commission which my brother

Letter from Miss Wordsworth to H. C. R.

has given me, as it affords me an opportunity of expressing the pleasure with which I think of you, and of our long journey side by side in the pleasant sunshine, our splendid entrance into the great city, and our rambles together in the crowded streets. I assure you I am not ungrateful for even the least of your kind attentions, and shall be happy in return to be your guide amongst these mountains, where, if you bring a mind free from care, I can promise you a rich store of noble enjoyments. My brother and sister too will be exceedingly happy to see you; and, if you tell him stories from Spain of enthusiasm, patriotism, and detestation of the usurper, my brother will be a ready listener; and in presence of these grand works of nature you may feed each other's lofty hopes. We are waiting with the utmost anxiety for the issue of that battle which you arranged so nicely by Charles Lamb's fireside. My brother goes to seek the newspapers whenever it is possible to get a sight of one, and he is almost out of patience that the tidings are delayed so long.

* * * * * *

Pray, as you most likely see Charles at least from time to time, tell me how they are going on. There is nobody in the world out of our own house for whom I am more deeply interested. You will, I know, be happy that our little ones are all going on well. The little delicate Catherine, the only one for whom we had any serious alarm, gains ground daily. Yet it will be long before she can be, or have the appearance of being, a stoút child. There was great joy in the house at my return, which each shewed in a different way.

CHAP. XIII. — 1810.

They are sweet wild creatures, and I think you would love them all. John is thoughtful with his wildness; Dora alive, active, and quick; Thomas innocent and simple as a new-born babe. John had no feeling but of bursting joy when he saw me. Dorothy's first question was, "Where is my doll?" We had delightful weather when I first got home; but on the first morning Dorothy roused me from my sleep with, "It is time to get up, Aunt, it is a blasty morning—it does blast so." And the next morning, not more encouraging, she said, "It is a hailing morning—it hails so hard." You must know that our house stands on a hill, exposed to all hails and blasts. . . . .

D. WORDSWORTH.

CHARLES LAMB TO H. C. R.

1810.

Dear R——,

Letter from C. Lamb to H. C. R.

My brother, whom you have met at my rooms (a plump, good-looking man of seven-and-forty), has written a book about humanity, which I transmit to you herewith. Wilson the publisher has put it into his head that you can get it reviewed for him. I dare say it is not in the scope of your Review; but if you could put it in any likely train he would rejoice. For, alas! our boasted humanity partakes of vanity. As it is, he teazes me to death with choosing to suppose that I could get it into all the Reviews at a moment's notice. I!! who have been set up as a mark for them to throw at, and would willingly consign them all to Megæra's snaky locks.

But here's the book, and don't show it to Mrs. Collier, for I remember she makes excellent eel soup, and the leading points of the book are directed against that very process.

Yours truly,
C. LAMB.

Madame Lavaggi in London.

Miss Wordsworth left London just at the time of the arrival of Madame Lavaggi, the Spanish lady of whom I have already spoken. She came to England because the presence of the French rendered her own country intolerable to her. She was a high-spirited patriot and also a good Catholic, but thoroughly liberal as far as her narrow information permitted. The only occasion on which she showed any bigoted or ungenerous feeling was on my showing her at the Tower of London the axe with which Anne Boleyn was beheaded. "Ah! que j'adore cet instrument!" she exclaimed. On my remonstrating with her, she told me she had been brought up to consider Anne Boleyn as one possessed by a devil; that naughty children were frightened by the threat of being sent to her; and that she was held to be the great cause of the Reformation, as the seducer of the King, &c. &c. No wonder that Romanists should so think, when Protestants have extensively circulated that very foolish line ascribed to Gray—

"When Gospel truth first beam'd from Anna's eyes."

Madame Lavaggi received my correction of her notions in the very best spirit. She is the one Spaniard of whom I think with especial respect and kindness. We of colder temperament and more sober minds feel ourselves oppressed by the stronger feelings of more passionate characters—at least this is the case with me. At the same time I fully recognize the dignity of passion, and am able to admire what I have not, and am not.

At the end of this year I wrote a few pages entirely devoted to Coleridge. The following is the substance of them :—

Coleridge.

Nov. 14*th.*—Saw Coleridge for the first time in private, at Charles Lamb's. A short interview, which allowed of little opportunity for the display of his peculiar powers.

He related to us that Jeffrey, the editor of the Edinburgh Review, had lately called on him, and assured him that he was a great admirer of Wordsworth's poetry, that the Lyrical Ballads were always on his table, and that Wordsworth had been attacked in the Review simply because the errors of men of genius ought to be exposed. Towards me, Coleridge added, Jeffrey was even flattering. He was like a schoolboy, who, having tried his man and been thrashed, becomes contentedly a fag.

Nov. 15*th.*—A very delightful evening at Charles Lamb's; Coleridge, Morgan, Mr. Burney, &c., there. Coleridge very eloquent on German metaphysics and poetry, Wordsworth, and Spanish politics.

Coleridge on Wordsworth.

Of Wordsworth he spoke with great warmth of praise, but objected to some of his poems. Wishing to avoid an undue regard to the high and genteel in society, Wordsworth had unreasonably attached himself to the low, so that he himself erred at last. He should have recollected that verse being the language of passion, and passion dictating energetic expressions, it became him to make his subjects and style accord. One asks why tales so simple were not in prose. With "malice prepense" he fixes on objects of reflection, which do not naturally excite it. Coleridge censured the disproportion in the machinery of the poem on the Gipsies. Had the whole world been standing idle, more powerful arguments to expose the evil could not have been brought forward. Of Kant he spoke in terms of high admiration. In his "Himmel's System" he appeared to unite the genius of Burnet and Newton. He praised also the "Träume eines Geistersehers," and intimated that he should one day translate the work on the Sublime and Beautiful. The "Kritik der Urtheilskraft" he considered the most astonishing of Kant's works. Both Fichte and Schelling he thought would be found at last to have erred where they deviated from Kant; but he considered Fichte a great logician, and Schelling perhaps a still greater man. In both he thought the want of gratitude towards their master a sign of the absence of the highest excellence. Schelling's system resolves itself into fanaticism, not better than that of Jacob Boehme. Coleridge had known Tieck at Rome, but was not aware of his eminence as a poet. He conceded to Goethe universal talent, but felt a want of moral life to be the defect of his poetry. Schiller he spoke more kindly of. He quoted "Nimmer, das glaubt mir, erscheinen die Götter, nimmer allein."* (He has since translated it.) Of Jean Paul he said that

Coleridge on German philosophers

* "Never alone, believe me, do the Gods appear." This poem is entitled "Dithyrambe" in the twelve-volume edition of Schiller's works, 1838, Vol. I., p. 240.

Chap. xiii. — 1810. Wit.

his wit consisted not in pointing out analogies in themselves striking, but in finding unexpected analogies. You admire, not the things combined, but the act of combination. He applied this also to Windham. But is not this the character of all wit? That which he contrasted with it as a different kind of wit is in reality not wit, but acuteness. He made an elaborate distinction between fancy and imagination. The excess of fancy is delirium, of imagination mania. Fancy is the arbitrarily bringing together of things that lie remote, and forming them into a unity. The materials lie ready for the fancy, which acts by a sort of juxtaposition. On the other hand, the imagination under excitement generates and produces a form of its own. The "seas of milk and ships of amber" he quoted as fanciful delirium. He related, as a sort of disease of imagination, what occurred to himself. He had been watching intently the motions of a kite among the mountains of Westmoreland, when on a sudden he saw two kites in an opposite direction. This delusion lasted some time. At last he discovered that the two kites were the fluttering branches of a tree beyond a wall.

Coleridge on fancy and imagination.

Nov. 18th.—At Godwin's with Northcote, Coleridge, &c. Coleridge made himself very merry at the expense of Fuseli, whom he always called Fuzzle or Fuzly. He told a story of Fuseli's being on a visit at Liverpool at a time when unfortunately he had to divide the attention of the public with a Prussian soldier, who had excited a great deal of notice by his enormous powers of eating. And the annoyance was aggravated by persons persisting in considering the soldier as Fuseli's country-

Anecdote of Fuseli.

man. He spent his last evening at Dr. Crompton's,* when Roscoe (whose visitor Fuseli was) took an opportunity of giving a hint to the party that no one should mention the glutton. The admonition unfortunately was not heard by a lady, who, turning to the great Academician and lecturer, said, "Well, sir, your countryman has been surpassing himself!"—"Madam," growled the irritated painter, "the fellow is no countryman of mine."—"He is a foreigner! Have you not heard what he has been doing? He has eaten a live cat!"—"A live cat!" every one exclaimed, except Fuseli, whose rage was excited by the suggestion of a lady famous for her blunders,—"Dear me, Mr. Fuseli, that would be a fine subject for your pencil."—"My pencil, madam?"—"To be sure, sir, as the horrible is your forte."—"You mean the terrible, madam," he replied with an assumed composure, muttering at the same time between his teeth, "if a silly woman can mean anything."

Dec. 20th.—Met Coleridge by accident with Charles and Mary Lamb. As I entered he was apparently speaking of Christianity. He went on to say that miracles are not an essential in the Christian system. He insisted that they were not brought forward as proofs; that they were acknowledged to have been performed by others as well as the true believers. Pharaoh's magicians wrought miracles, though those of Moses were more powerful. In the New Testament, the appeal is made to the knowledge which the believer has of the truths of his religion, not to the wonders wrought to make him believe. Of Jesus Christ

Miracles.

* The father of Judge Crompton.

Chap. xiii. — 1810.

he asserted that he was a Platonic philosopher. And when Christ spoke of his identity with the Father, he spoke in a Spinozistic or Pantheistic sense, according to which he could truly say that his transcendental sense was one with God, while his empirical sense retained its finite nature. On my making the remark that in a certain sense every one who utters a truth may be said to be inspired, Coleridge assented, and afterwards named Fox and others among the Quakers, Madame Guyon, St. Theresa, &c., as being also inspired.

Coleridge on inspiration.

On my suggesting, in the form of a question, that an eternal absolute truth, like those of religion, could not be proved by an accidental fact in history, he at once assented, and declared it to be not advisable to ground the belief in Christianity on historical evidence. He went so far as to affirm that religious belief is an act, not of the understanding, but of the will. To become a believer, one must love the doctrine, and feel in harmony with it, and not sit down coolly to inquire whether he should believe it or not.

On belief.

Notwithstanding the sceptical tendency of such opinions, Coleridge added, that, accepting Christianity as he did in its spirit in conformity with his own philosophy, he was content for the sake of its divine truths to receive as articles of faith, or perhaps I ought to say, leave undisputed the miracles of the New Testament, taken in their literal sense.

Saying of Pascal.

In writing this I am reminded of one of the famous sayings of Pascal, which Jacobi quotes repeatedly: "The things that belong to men must be understood in order that they may be loved ; the things that belong to God must be loved in order to be understood."

Coleridge on Spinoza.

Coleridge warmly praised Spinoza, Jacobi on Spinoza, and Schiller " Ueber die Sendung Moses," &c. And he concurred with me in thinking the main fault of Spinoza to be his attempting to reduce to demonstration that which must be an object of faith. He did not agree with Charles Lamb in his admiration of those playful and delightful plays of Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost" and the " Midsummer Night's Dream;" but both affirmed that not a line of " Titus Andronicus" could have been from Shakespeare's pen.

Dec. 23rd.—Coleridge dined with the Colliers, talked a vast deal, and delighted every one. Politics, Kantian philosophy, and Shakespeare successively—and at last a playful exposure of some bad poets. His remarks on Shakespeare were singularly ingenious. Shakespeare, he said, delighted in portraying characters in which the intellectual powers are found in a pre-eminent degree, while the moral faculties are wanting, at the same time that he taught the superiority of moral greatness. Such is the contrast exhibited in Iago and Othello. Iago's most marked feature is his delight in governing by fraud and superior understanding the noble-minded and generous Moor. In Richard III. cruelty is less the prominent trait than pride, to which a sense of personal deformity gave a deadly venom. Coleridge, however, asserted his belief that Shakespeare wrote hardly anything of this play except the character of Richard : he found the piece a stock play and re-wrote the parts which developed the hero's character : he certainly did

On Shakespeare.

On Richard III.

CHAP. XIII. — 1810.

Coleridge on Pericles.

not write the scenes in which Lady Anne yielded to the usurper's solicitations. He considered "Pericles" as illustrating the way in which Shakespeare handled a piece he had to refit for representation. At first he proceeded with indifference, only now and then troubling himself to put in a thought or an image, but as he advanced he interested himself in his employment, and the last two acts are almost entirely by him.

On Hamlet.

Hamlet he considered in a point of view which seems to agree very well with the representation given in "Wilhelm Meister." Hamlet is a man whose ideal and internal images are so vivid that all real objects are faint and dead to him. This we see in his soliloquies on the nature of man and his disregard of life: hence also his vacillation, and the purely convulsive energies he displayed. He acts only by fits and snatches. He manifests a strong inclination to suicide. On my observing that it appeared strange Shakespeare did not make suicide the termination to his piece, Coleridge replied that Shakespeare wished to show how even such a character is at last obliged to be the sport of chance—a salutary moral doctrine. But I thought this the suggestion of the moment only, and not a happy one, to obviate a seeming objection. Hamlet remains at last the helpless, unpractical being, though every inducement to activity is given which the very appearance of the spirit of his murdered father could bring with it.

On Falstaff.

Coleridge also considered Falstaff as an instance of the predominance of intellectual power. He is content to be thought both a liar and a coward in order to obtain influence over the minds of his associates. His aggravated lies about the robbery are conscious and purposed, not inadvertent untruths. On my observing that this account seemed to justify Cooke's representation, according to which a foreigner imperfectly understanding the character would fancy Falstaff the designing knave who does actually outwit the Prince, Coleridge answered that, in his own estimation, Falstaff is the superior, who cannot easily be convinced that the Prince has escaped him; but that, as in other instances, Shakespeare has shown us the defeat of mere intellect by a noble feeling; the Prince being the superior moral character, who rises above his insidious companion.

Coleridge on Hume.

On my noticing Hume's obvious preference of the French tragedians to Shakespeare, Coleridge exclaimed, "Hume comprehended as much of Shakespeare as an apothecary's phial would, placed under the falls of Niagara."

On Milton.

We spoke of Milton. He was, said Coleridge, a most determined aristocrat, an enemy to popular elections, and he would have been most decidedly hostile to the Jacobins of the present day. He would have thought our popular freedom excessive. He was of opinion that the government belonged to the wise, and he thought the people fools. In all his works there is but one exceptionable passage—that in which he vindicates the expulsion of the members from the House of Commons by Cromwell. Coleridge on this took occasion to express his approbation of the death of Charles.

On Paradise Regained.

Of Milton's "Paradise Regained," he observed that however inferior its kind is to "Paradise Lost," its execution is superior. This was all Milton meant in the preference he is said to have given to his later poem. It is a didactic poem, and formed on the model of Job.

Coleridge remarked on the lesson of tolerance taught us by the opposite opinions entertained concerning the death of Charles by such great men as Milton and Jeremy Taylor.

Coleridge on Jeremy Taylor.

Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Dying," he affirmed, is a perfect poem, and in all its particulars, even the rhythm, may be compared with Young's "Night Thoughts." In the course of his metaphysical conversation, Coleridge remarked on Hartley's theory of association. This doctrine is as old as Aristotle, and Hartley himself, after publishing his system, when he wrote his second volume on religion, built his proofs, not on the maxims of his first volume, which he had already learnt to appreciate better, but on the principles of other schools. Coleridge quoted (I forget from whom) a description of association as the "law of our imagination." Thought, he observed, is a laborious breaking through the law of association; the natural train of fancy is violently repressed; the free yielding to its power produces dreaming or delirium. The great absurdity committed by those who would build everything on association is that they forget the things associated: these are left out of the account.

On Locke.

Of Locke he spoke, as usual, with great contempt, that is, in reference to his metaphysical work. He considered him as having led to the destruction of metaphysical science, by encouraging the unlearned public to think that with mere common sense they might dispense with disciplined study. He praised Stillingfleet as Locke's opponent; and he ascribed Locke's popularity to his political character, being the advocate of the new against the old dynasty, to his religious character as a Christian, though but an Arian —for both parties, the Christians against the sceptics, and the liberally-minded against the orthodox, were glad to raise his reputation; and to the nationality of the people, who considered him and Newton as the adversaries of the German Leibnitz. Voltaire, to depress Leibnitz, raised Locke.

H. C. R. to T. R.

Letter from H. C. R. to T. R.

"Coleridge kept me on the stretch of attention and admiration from half-past three till twelve o'clock. On politics, metaphysics, and poetry, more especially on the Regency, Kant, and Shakespeare, he was astonishingly eloquent. But I cannot help remarking that, although he practises all sorts of delightful tricks, and shows admirable skill in riding his hobby, yet he may be easily unsaddled. I was surprised to find how one may obtain from him concessions which lead to gross inconsistencies. Though an incomparable declaimer and speech-maker, he has neither the readiness nor the acuteness required by a colloquial disputant; so that, with a sense of inferiority which makes me feel humble in his presence, I do not feel in the least afraid of him. Rough said yesterday, that he is sure Coleridge would never have succeeded at the Bar even as a speaker."

This I wrote when I knew little of him; I used afterwards to compare him as a disputant to a serpent—easy to kill, if you assume the offensive, but if you let him attack, his bite is mortal. Some years after this, when I saw Madame de Staël in London, I asked her what she thought of him: she replied, "He is very great in monologue, but he has no idea of dialogue." This I repeated, and it appeared in the Quarterly Review.

CHAP. XIII. — 1810. Madame de Staël.

Flaxman.

It was at the very close of the year that I made an acquaintance which afforded me unqualified satisfaction, except as all enjoyments that are transient are followed by sorrow when they are terminated. This new acquaintance was the great sculptor, John Flaxman.

Miss Flaxman.

Having learned from Rough that my German acquaintance, Miss Flaxman, had returned, and was living with her brother, I called on her to make my apologies for neglecting to deliver my letter to Rough. She received them, not with undignified indifference, but with great good-nature. On this occasion I was introduced to Mrs. Flaxman, a shrewd lively talkative woman, and received an invitation to spend the last night of the year with them. The whole day was interesting. I find from my pocket-book that I translated in the forenoon a portion of Goethe's "Sammler und die Seinigen," which I never ended, because I could not invent English comic words to express the abuses arising from one-sidedness in the several schools of painting. In the afternoon I sat with Mrs. Barbauld, still in all the beauty of her fine taste, correct understanding, as well as pure integrity; and, in the evening, I was one of a merry party at Flaxman's. But this evening I saw merely the good-humoured, even frolic-

Translating from Goethe.

Mrs. Barbauld.

Party at Flaxman's.

some, kind-hearted man. Every sportive word and action of Flaxman's was enhanced by his grotesque figure. He had an intelligent and benignant countenance, but he was short and hump-backed, so that in his laughter it often seemed as if he were mocking himself. There were the Roughs and a few others, enough to fill two very small rooms (No. 7, Buckingham Street, which Flaxman bought when he settled in London on his return from Italy, and in which he died). He introduced to me a lively, rather short, and stout girl, whom he called his "daughter Ellen." I took him literally, and said I thought he had no child. "Only in one way she is my daughter. Her other father, there, is Mr. Porden, the architect." This same Ellen Porden became ultimately the wife of Captain Franklin, the North Pole voyager.

Manning.

It was also in this year that I became acquainted with Manning,* then a special pleader, now, perhaps, the most learned man at the bar, serjeant or barrister. He was the son of a well-known Arian divine at Exeter, and he has had the manliness and integrity never to be ashamed of Dissent.

I ought not to omit the circumstance that I kept four terms this year.

H. C. R. TO MISS WORDSWORTH.

56, Hatton Garden, Dec. 23rd, 1810.

My Dear Madam,

. . . . I have postponed answering your

* The Queen's Ancient Serjeant, who died in 1866.

In early life Manning devoted himself for a year and a half to agriculture. Afterwards he went to Germany for a year, to learn the language, in order to fit himself for mercantile pursuits. Finally he fixed on the law as a profession.

CHAP. XIII. — 1810.

acceptable letter till I could speak to you concerning our common friends, the Lambs.

Charles and Mary Lamb.

Mary, I am glad to say, is just now very comfortable. But I hear she has been in a feeble and tottering condition. She has put herself under Dr. Tuthill, who has prescribed water. Charles, in consequence, resolved to accommodate himself to her, and since lord mayor's day has abstained from all other liquor, as well as from smoking. We shall all rejoice, indeed, if this experiment succeeds.

Coleridge.

Who knows but that this promising resolution may have been strengthened by the presence of Coleridge? I have spent several evenings with your friend. I say a great deal when I declare that he has not sunk below my expectations, for they were never raised so before by the fame of any man. He appears to be quite well, and if the admiration he excites in me be mingled with any sentiments of compassion, this latter feeling proceeds rather from what I have heard, than from what I have seen. He has more eloquence than any man I ever saw, except perhaps Curran, the Irish orator, who possesses in a very high degree the only excellence which Coleridge wants, to be a perfect parlour orator, viz. short sentences. Coleridge cannot *con*verse. He addresses himself to his hearers. At the same time, he is a much better listener than I expected.

H. C. R.'s love of Spain.

Your kind invitation to the Lakes is most welcome. If I do not embrace the offer, be assured it is not from want of a strong desire to do so. I wish for no journey so much, except, indeed, another voyage to Spain. My admiration, my love, and anxious care continue to be fixed on that country; and I have no doubt that if my hopes are not so lofty as those your brother cherishes, it is only because I am myself not so lofty.

* * * * * *

Coleridge spent an afternoon with us on Sunday. He was delightful. Charles Lamb was unwell, and could not join us. His change of habit, though it on the whole improves his health, yet when he is low-spirited leaves him without a remedy or relief.

* * * * * *

To Mr. Wordsworth my best remembrances. We want unprofaned and unprostituted words to express the kind of feeling I entertain towards him.

Believe me, &c. &c.

H. C. R.

P.S. I was interested in your account of the children, and their reception of you; but it is not only mountain-children that make verbs. I heard an Essex child of seven say lately, in delight at a fierce torrent of rain, "How it is storming!" The same boy had just before said, "I love to see it roaring and pouring." I have more than once remarked the elements of poetic sense in him.

CHAP. XIV.
—
1811.

CHAPTER XIV.

1811.

Diary.

THIS year I began to keep a Diary. This relieves me from one difficulty, but raises another. Hitherto I have had some trouble in bringing back to my memory the most material incidents in the proper order. It was a labour of *col*lection. Now I have to *se*lect. When looking at a diary, there seems to be too little distinction between the insignificant and the important, and one is reminded of the proverb, "The wood cannot be seen for the trees."*

C. Lamb's opinion of Kehama.

January 8th.—Spent part of the evening with Charles Lamb (unwell) and his sister. He had just read the "Curse of Kehama," which he said he liked better than any of Southey's long poems. The descriptions he thought beautiful, particularly the finding of Kailyal by Ereenia. He liked the opening, and part of the description of hell; but, after all, he was not made happier by reading the poem. There is too much trick in it. The three statues and the vacant space for Kehama resemble a pantomime scene; and the love is ill managed. On the whole, however, Charles Lamb thinks the poem infinitely superior to "Thalaba."

* Henceforward selections will be given from the Diary, with additions from the Reminiscences. These additions will be marked [Rem.], and the year in which they were written will be stated at the foot of the page.

Charles Lamb on Wordsworth and Coleridge.

We spoke of Wordsworth and Coleridge. To my surprise, Lamb asserted the latter to be the greater man. He preferred the "Ancient Mariner" to anything Wordsworth had written. He thought the latter too apt to force his own individual feelings on the reader, instead of, like Shakespeare, entering fully into the feelings of others. This, I observed, is very much owing to the lyrical character of Wordsworth's poems. And Lamb concluded by expressing high admiration of Wordsworth, and especially of the Sonnets. He also spoke of "Hart-leap Well" as exquisite.

Some one, speaking of Shakespeare, mentioned his anachronism in which Hector speaks of Aristotle. "That's what Johnson referred to," said Lamb, "when he wrote,—

"And panting Time toils after him in vain!"

Flaxman.

January 17th.—In the evening a call at Flaxman's. Read to Mrs. Flaxman a part of Schlegel's "Critique on the Designs for Dante," which of course gratified her. She told me they were done in Italy for Mr. Hope, on very moderate terms, merely to give Flaxman employment for the evening. Fuseli, when he saw them, said, "I used to think myself the best composer, but now I own Flaxman to be the greater man." Some years ago, when I met Flaxman at Mrs. Iremonger's, I mentioned Schlegel's praise of him for his preference of Dante to Milton. It was, said Schlegel, a proof that he surpassed his countrymen in taste. Flaxman said he could not accept the compliment on the ground of preference. He thought Milton the very greatest of poets, and he could not forgive Charles James Fox for not liking him. He had three reasons for choosing Dante. First, he was unwilling to interfere with Fuseli, who had made choice of Milton for his designs. Second, Milton supplies few figures, while Dante abounds in them. And, third, he had heard that Michael Angelo had made a number of designs in the margin of a copy of Dante.

Mrs. Flaxman said, this evening, that the common cloak of the lower classes in Italy suggested the drapery for Virgil and Dante. While we were talking on this subject Flaxman came in. He spoke with great modesty of his designs; he could do better now, and wished the Germans had something better on which to exercise their critical talents.

Liston.

January 19th.—With Collier, &c., at Covent Garden. "Twelfth Night"—Liston's Malvolio excellent. I never saw him to greater advantage. It is a character in all respects adapted to him. His inimitable gravity till he receives the letter, and his incomparable smiles in the cross-gartered scene, are the perfection of nature and art united.

Coleridge on Shakespeare's Fools.

January 29th.—I walked with Coleridge to Rickman's, where we dined. He talked on Shakespeare, particularly his Fools. These he regarded as supplying the place of the ancient chorus. The ancient drama, he observed, is distinguished from the Shakespearian in this, that it exhibits a sort of abstraction, not of character, but of idea. A certain sentiment or passion was exhibited in all its purity, unmixed with anything that could interfere with its effect. Shakespeare, on the other hand, imitates life, mingled as we find it with joy and sorrow. We meet constantly in life with persons who are, as it were, unfeeling spectators of the most passionate situations. The Fool serves to supply the place of some such uninterested person, where all the other characters are interested. The most genuine and real of Shakespeare's Fools is in "Lear." In "Hamlet" the fool is, as it were, divided into several parts, dispersed through the play.

Coleridge on Law.

On our walk back Coleridge spoke warmly and eloquently on the effect of laws in the formation of moral character and feeling in a people. He differed from Bentham's censure of the laws of usury, Coleridge contending that those laws, by exciting a general contempt towards usurers, had a deterring effect on many. Genoa fell by becoming a people of money-lenders instead of merchants. In money loans one party is in sorrow; in the traffic of merchandise, both parties gain and rejoice. This led to talk on the nature of criminal law in general. Some acts, viz. murder, rape, unnatural offences, are to be punished for the sake of the effect on the public mind, that a just sentiment may be taught, and not merely for the sake of prevention. The acts ought in themselves to be punished. He dwelt on the influence of law in forming the public mind, and giving direction to moral feeling.

Mrs. Buller.

February 1st.—A visit to a most accomplished lady of the old school, Mrs. Buller.* The poems of Southey and Scott she has put into her Index Expurgatorius. She cannot bear the irregularity of their versification. Mr. Jerningham was present, and she called him to his face "the last of the old school." He is already forgotten, more completely than those will be whom his friend and contemporary treated so contemptuously.

* See page 386.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

Flaxman's Lecture on Sculpture.

February 18th.—At the Royal Academy. Heard Flaxman's introductory Lecture on Sculpture. It was for the most part, or entirely, historical. He endeavoured to show that in all times English sculptors have excelled when not prevented by extraneous circumstances. This gave great pleasure to a British audience. In one or two instances the lecture was applauded in a way that he would be ashamed of. He spoke of some cathedral sculpture of the time of Henry VIII., and contrasting the remains of different artists, said, "Here, too, we find that the British artists were superior to their rivals on the continent." This was received with loud clapping. The John-Bullism displayed was truly ridiculous. Flaxman, however, pleased me in every respect in which I had a right to be pleased. He spoke like an artist who loved and honoured his art, but without any personal feeling. He had all the unpretending simplicity of a truly great man. His unimposing figure received consequence from the animation of his countenance; and his voice, though feeble, was so judiciously managed and so clear, and his enunciation was so distinct, that he was audible to a large number of people.

Mrs. Barbauld.

March 12th.—Tea and chess with Mrs. Barbauld. Read on my way to her house Chapters VIII. to XIV. of Southey's "Madoc." Exceedingly pleased with the touching painting in this poem. It has not the splendid glare of "Kehama," but there is a uniform glow of pure and beautiful morality and interesting description, which renders the work very pleasing. Surely none but a pedant can affect or be seduced to think slightingly of this poem. At all events, the sensibility which feels such beauties is more desirable than the acuteness which could suggest severe criticism.

March 13th.—A talk with Coleridge, who called on me. Speaking of Southey, he said S. was not able to appreciate Spanish poetry. He wanted modifying power: he was a jewel-setter—whatever he found to his taste, he formed it into, or made it into, the ornament of a story.

Coleridge.

March 24th.—A call on Coleridge, who expatiated beautifully on the beneficial influence of brotherly and sisterly love in the formation of character. He attributed, he said, certain peculiarities in persons whom he named to the circumstance that they had no brother.*

March 29th.—Spent the evening with W. Hazlitt. Smith, his wife and son, Hume, Coleridge, and afterwards Lamb there. Coleridge philosophized as usual. He said that all systems of philosophy might be reduced to two, the dynamical and the mechanical; the one converting all quantity into quality, the other vice versâ. He and Hazlitt joined in an obscure statement about abstract ideas. Hazlitt said he had learnt from painting that it is difficult to form an idea of an individual object,—that we first have only a general idea; that is, a vague, broken, imperfect recollection of the individual object. This I observed was what the multitude meant by a general idea, and Hazlitt said he had no other.

Coleridge and Hazlitt.

* On some other occasion I recollect his saying that he envied Wordsworth for having had a sister, and that his own character had suffered from the want of a sister.—H. C. R.

Chap. xiv. — 1811.

Coleridge spoke of the impossibility of referring the individual to the class without having a previous notion of the class. This is Kantian logic.

The Edinburgh Review.

We talked of politics. It was amusing to observe how Coleridge blundered against Scotchmen and Frenchmen. He represented the Edinburgh Review as a concentration of all the smartness of all Scotland. Edinburgh is a talking town, and whenever, in the Conversaziones, a single spark is elicited, it is instantly caught, preserved, and brought to the Review. He denied humour to the nation. Smith appealed in behalf of Smollett. Coleridge endeavoured to make a distinction, i.e. to maintain his point, and yet allow the claim of Smith.

Before Lamb came, Coleridge had spoken with warmth of his excellent and serious conversation. Hazlitt imputed his puns to humility.

Coleridge.

March 30th.—At C. Lamb's. Found Coleridge and Hazlitt there, and had a half-hour's chat. Coleridge spoke feelingly of Godwin and the unjust treatment he had met with. In apology for Southey's review of Godwin's "Life of Chaucer," Coleridge ingeniously observed that persons who are themselves very pure, are sometimes on that account blunt in their moral feelings. This I believe to be a very true remark indeed. Something like this I have expressed respecting ———. She is perfectly just herself, and expects everybody to be equally so. She is consequently severe, and occasionally even harsh in her judgments.

"For right too rigid hardens into wrong."

Coleridge used strong language against those who were once the extravagant admirers of Godwin, and afterwards became his most bitter opponents. I noticed the infinite superiority of Godwin over the French writers in moral feeling and tendency. I had learned to hate Helvetius and Mirabeau, and yet retained my love for Godwin. This was agreed to as a just sentiment. Coleridge said there was more in Godwin, after all, than he was once willing to admit, though not so much as his enthusiastic admirers fancied. He had openly opposed him, but nevertheless visited him. Southey's severity he attributed to the habit of reviewing. Southey had said of Coleridge's poetry that he was a Dutch imitator of the Germans. Coleridge quoted this, not to express any displeasure at it, but to show in what way Southey could speak of him.

Godwin.

Southey.

Went with C. Lamb to the Lyceum. "The Siege of Belgrade" afforded me considerable amusement. The comic scenes are droll, though commonplace enough, and Miss Kelly and Mathews gave due effect to them. But Braham's singing delighted me. His trills, shakes, and quavers are, like those of all other great singers, tiresome to me; but his pure melody, the simple song clearly articulated, is equal to anything I ever heard. His song was acted as well as sung delightfully. Indeed I think Braham a fine actor while singing; he throws his soul into his throat, but his whole frame is awakened, and his gestures and looks are equally impassioned.

Braham.

When Dignum and Mrs. Bland came on the stage together, Charles Lamb exclaimed,—

C. Lamb.

"And lo, two puddings smoked upon the board!"

Chap. xiv.
—
1811.

De Foe's Colonel Jack.

April 2nd.—A walk to Clapton, reading "Colonel Jack," the latter half of which is but dull and commonplace. The moment he ceases to be a thief, he loses everything interesting. Yet there runs through the work a spirit of humanity which does honour to De Foe. He powerfully pleaded for a humane treatment of the slaves in America, at a time when no man thought of abolishing slavery itself.

Mrs. Siddons as Margaret of Anjou.

April 4th.—At Pope's benefit, at the Opera House. "The Earl of Warwick." Mrs. Siddons most nobly played her part as Margaret of Anjou. The character is one to which she can still render justice. She looked ill, and I thought her articulation indistinct, and her voice drawling and funereal during the first act; but as she advanced in the play, her genius triumphed over natural impediments. She was all that could be wished. The scene in which she wrought upon the mind of Warwick was perfect. And in the last act, her triumphant joy at the entrance of Warwick, whom she had stabbed, was incomparable. She laughed convulsively, and staggered off the stage as if drunk with delight; and in every limb showed the tumult of passion with an accuracy and a force equally impressive to the critic and the man of feeling.

Her advancing age is a real pain to me. As an actor, she has left with me the conviction that there never was, and never will be, her equal.

Elliston.

Elliston played Edward. He is a fine bustling comedian; but he bustles also in tragedy.

Braham.

Braham sang delightfully "Said a Smile to a Tear."

He is incomparably the most delightful male singer I ever heard.

Liston.

Liston, in the "Waterman," gave a burlesque song with admirable humour. I believe he will soon be acknowledged to be our first comedian. He raises more universal laughs than any one, excepting perhaps Mathews, who is only a first-rate mimic. Liston burlesqued Braham, and there arose a contest between the lovers of burlesque and the jealous admirers of exquisite music; but the reasonable party prevailed, and Liston's encored song was received with great applause, though the burlesque was not less apparent than before.

Incledon.

Mathews.

Incledon sang "The Storm." It was said to be fine. Mathews sang his "Mail Coach"—a most excellent thing in its way.

I have seldom had so much pleasure at the theatre.

Horne Tooke.

April 28th.—Anthony Robinson related an anecdote of Horne Tooke, showing the good humour and composure of which he was capable. Holcroft was with him at a third person's table. They had a violent quarrel. At length Holcroft said, as he rose to leave the room, "Mr. Tooke, I tell you, you are a ——— scoundrel, and I always thought you so." Tooke detained him, and said, "Mr. Holcroft, some time ago you asked me to come and dine with you; do tell me what day it shall be." Holcroft stayed.

Flaxman.

May 7th.—In the afternoon a pleasant chat with Flaxman alone. He spoke of artists and art with his unaffected modesty and kindness. I asked him why the Germans, who appreciated him, would not acknowledge the merit of our painters, even Reynolds. "My art," Flaxman answered, "led me to make use of classical fable, of which the Germans are fond. Reynolds was only a gentlemanly scholar." Sir Joshua judged ill of sculpture ; on that subject he wrote not so well as Rafael Mengs, of whom Flaxman spoke slightingly, just as I recollect hearing Fernow at Jena speak.

CHAP. XIV.
1811.

At Thelwall's.

May 9th.—Dined with Thelwall. A large party. The man whom we went to see, and, if we could, admire, was Dr. Wolcott, better known as Peter Pindar.

Dr. Wolcott.

He talked about the artists, said that West could paint neither ideal beauty nor from nature, called Opie the Michael Angelo of old age, complained of the ingratitude of certain artists who owed everything to himself, spoke contemptuously of Walter Scott, who, he said, owed his popularity to hard names. He also declaimed against rhyme in general, which he said was fit only for burlesque. Not even Butler would live. At the same time he praised exceedingly the "Heroic Epistle to Sir W. Chambers." Congreve he considered the greatest miracle of genius, and that such a man should early abandon literature was to him unaccountable. As Peter Pindar was blind, I was requested to help him to his wine, which was in a separate pint bottle, and was not wine at all, but brandy.* After dinner he eulogized brandy, calling it τὸ πᾶν, and said, "He who drinks it heartily must make interest to die."

He said he had made a rhyme that morning, of which Butler might not have been ashamed :—

Say, would you long the shafts of death defy,
Pray keep your inside wet, your outside dry.

* In telling this story Mr. Robinson would humorously relate how, by pouring some into a second glass, he contrived to ascertain the fact for himself.

I referred to his own writings. He said he recollected them with no pleasure. "Satire is a bad trade."

At C. Lamb's.

May 15th.—A very pleasant call on Charles and Mary Lamb. Read his version of the story of Prince Dorus, the long-nosed king.* Gossipped about writing. Urged him to try his hand at a metrical Umarbeitung (working up) of "Reynard the Fox." He believed, he said, in the excellence of the work, but he was sure such a version as I suggested would not succeed now. The sense of humour, he maintained, is utterly extinct. No satire that is not personal will succeed.†

Speech at the Academical Society.

24th.—Devoted the day to a speech to be delivered at the Academical Society.‡ The question, "Which among the Arts of Oratory, History, and Poetry is most capable of being rendered serviceable to Mankind?" I spoke for somewhat more than an hour.

The three arts are alike liberal arts, since they are carried on with knowledge and freedom, and not slavishly. They constitute the great body of elegant learning—Humanity.

Oratory.

Oratory is the art of persuasion as opposed to logic—the art of reasoning. It is mischievous by withdrawing attention from the substance to the show, from the matter of discourse to its ornaments. I. Deliberative or senatorial eloquence. The evil of accustoming a people

* This is not in his collected works, and, as well as two volumes of Poems for Children, is likely to be lost.—H. C. R.

† An English version of "Reineke der Fuchs" was afterwards prepared by Samuel Naylor, Junr., and dedicated to his friend H. C. R. Published by Longman, 1844.

‡ As Mr. Robinson was a frequent attendant and speaker at Debating Societies, the notes of his speech on one of these occasions are given as a specimen.

to the stimulus of eloquence. This I illustrated by the French Revolution. For some years the people were kept in a frenzy by the orators. The result was not the acquirement of any habits favourable either to knowledge or liberty. The mind was left as barren and as unsusceptible of good influence as the earth from which the salt sea has receded. In the English Senate, Burke was not listened to. Fox has left no memorial of any good he has wrought by eloquence; his Libel Bill being the only good law he ever introduced. Neither the Habeas Corpus Act, nor the Bill of Rights, nor Magna Charta originated in eloquence. A senate of orators is a symptom of national decay. II. Judicial eloquence. I expatiated on the glorious spectacle of an English court of justice, and affirmed that its dignity would be lost if the people went into it as into a theatre, to admire the graces of the orators. But, in fact, there is little eloquence at present at the English Bar. Erskine the only prominent man in our time. I contrasted the state of popular feeling in Greece and Britain. I noticed the assertion of Demosthenes, that action is the first, second, and third part of an orator, and the fact that he was taught to speak by an actor. I admitted, however, that eloquence might occasionally be useful (though its resources were at the service alike of the tyrant and the free man, the oppressor and the oppressed), but it is only a sort of convulsive effect that can be produced. The storm which drives from a populous city the pestilential vapour hanging over it may accidentally save it for once from the plague; but it is the sun, which rises day by day, and the dew, which falls night by night, that give fertility to the valleys, though the silent operation of these causes does not so forcibly strike the senses.

History.

History, I observed, could instruct only by enabling us to anticipate future events from the past. But this it cannot do. The great events of political life are too unique to admit of a parallel. The Crusades, Reformation, &c. The emancipation of Switzerland, Holland, Portugal, Sweden, each took place on grounds of its own; and no inference could be drawn from one to another. No Irishman, for instance, wishing to deliver his country from English rule could draw an argument from the success of any other rebellion. The great outline of historical occurrences is beyond the sphere of human agency; it belongs to the economy of Divine Providence, and is illustrated in the gradual civilization of mankind. All the rest is pure uncertainty. Horace Walpole's historical doubts. Character of the Queen of Scots. The death of Charles XII. of Sweden.

History may be thought to improve the affections. This is so far from being true, that history shows the triumph of fraud, violence, and guilt; and if there were no resource elsewhere, the mind, by mere history, would be driven to despair.

[I omitted to show how little private persons can be improved by that which treats merely of public events, and also that statesmen have been guided by sagacity in the just comprehension of the actual state of things, and that learned men have seldom had any marked influence in public affairs.]

Poetry.

Poetry I described as having its origin in a principle of our nature, by which we are enabled to conceive of things as better than any actually known. The mind is cheered by its own images of excellence, and is thus enabled to bear up against the evils of life. Besides, we are more instructed by poetic than historic truth; for the one is but a series of insignificant accidents, while the other contains the essential truth of things. Homer's Achilles is a fine picture of a warrior whose breast is full of all the irascible, and yet all the affectionate, feelings. The baseness of a grovelling ambition of regal dominion is better exemplified in Shakespeare's "Richard III.," the tremendous consequence of yielding to the suggestions of evil in "Macbeth," the necessity of having the sensible and reflective qualities balanced by active energy in "Hamlet," the nature of jealousy in "Othello," than in any mere historic narratives.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

What can the historian do? He can give us plausible speculations. What the orator? Stir our feelings, but for a time only. Whereas the poet enriches our imaginations with images of every virtue.

I was followed by Twiss, Dumoulin, and Temple. At the close of the discussion, the few persons who had remained held up their hands,—five for history, and one each for poetry and eloquence.

Robert Hall.

May 26th.—As Robert Hall was to preach in the Borough, I went to hear him. The discourse was certainly a very beautiful one. He began by a florid but eloquent and impressive description of John the Baptist, and deduced from his history, not with the severity of argument which a logician requires, but with a facility of illustration which oratory delights in, and which was perfectly allowable, the practical importance of discharging the duty which belongs to our actual condition.

Coleridge.

June 6th.—Met Coleridge at the Exhibition. He drew my attention to the "vigorous impotence" of Fuseli, especially in his "Macbeth."* "The prominent witch," said Coleridge, "is smelling a stink." He spoke of painting as one of the lost arts.

June 11th.—Called on Coleridge. He made some striking observations on the character of an excellent man. "I have long," he said, "considered him an abstraction, rather than a person to be beloved. He is incapable of loving any excepting those whom he has benefited. He has been so in the habit of being useful, that he seems to lose his interest in those to whom he can be of no further use."

Lamb on Puns.

June 13th.—After tea a call on C. Lamb. His brother with him. A chat on puns. Evanson, in his "Dissonance of the Gospels," thinks Luke most worthy of credence. P—— said that Evanson was a *luke*warm Christian. I related this to C. Lamb. But, to him, a mere play of words was nothing without a spice of the ridiculous. He was reading with a friend a book of Eastern travels, and the friend observed of the Mantschu Tartars, that they must be cannibals. This Lamb thought better. The large room in the accountant's office at the East India House is divided into boxes or compartments, in each of which sit six clerks, Charles Lamb himself in one. They are called Compounds. The meaning of the word was asked one day, and Lamb said it was "a collection of simples."

* No. 12 of the Royal Academy Catalogue, where it is entered "Macbeth consulting the Vision of the Armed Head."—SHAKESPEARE. Macbeth. Act iv., scene 1.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

Mrs. Abington.

June 16th.—Dined at Serjeant Rough's, and met the once celebrated Mrs. Abington.* From her present appearance one can hardly suppose she could ever have been otherwise than plain. She herself laughed at her snub nose. But she is erect, has a large blue expressive eye, and an agreeable voice. She spoke of her retirement from the stage as occasioned by the vexations of a theatrical life. She said she should have gone mad if she had not quitted her profession. She has lost all her professional feelings, and when she goes to the theatre can laugh and cry like a child; but the trouble is too great, and she does not often go. It is so much a thing of course that a retired actor should be a laudator temporis acti, that I felt unwilling to draw from her any opinion of her successors. Mrs. Siddons, however, she praised, though not with the warmth of a genuine admirer. She said, "Early in life Mrs. Siddons was anxious to succeed in comedy, and played Rosalind before I retired." In speaking of the modern declamation, and the too elaborate emphasis given to insignificant words, she said, "That was brought in by them" (the Kembles). She spoke with admiration of the Covent Garden horses, and I have no doubt that her praise was meant to have the effect of satire. Of all the present actors, Murray most resembles Garrick. She spoke of Barry with great warmth. He was a nightingale. Such a voice was never heard. He confined himself to characters of great tenderness and sweetness, such as Romeo. She admitted the infinite superiority of Garrick in genius. His excellence lay in the bursts and quick transitions of passion, and in the variety and universality of his genius. Mrs. Abington would not have led me to suppose she had been on the stage by either her manner, or the substance of her conversation. She speaks with the ease of a person used to good society, rather than with the assurance of one whose business it was to imitate that ease.

* Mrs. Abington first appeared at the Haymarket as Miranda, in the "Busy Body." Her last public appearance was April 12th, 1799. She died in her house in Pall Mall, March 1815.

Flaxman.

Mr. and Mrs. Flaxman called in the evening. An argumentative conversation, which is not Flaxman's forte. He is delightful in the great purity of his moral sense, and the consequent delicacy of his taste on all subjects of ethics: but his understanding is not cast in a logical mould; and when he has a fixed idea, there is no possibility of changing it. He said Linnæus had made a great blunder in classing the whale with man, merely because it belongs to the mammalia. And it was impossible to make him acknowledge, or apparently to comprehend, the difference between an artificial and a natural classification. As a proof that Hume wished to apologize for Charles II., he quoted the sentence, "Charles was a polite husband and a generous lover;" and he did not perceive that this was a mere statement of fact, and by no means implied a wish to defend or vindicate. Hume could not have imagined that politeness is the appropriate virtue of a husband, or that the profusion of a king towards his mistresses is laudable. But it is not necessary, even for the purposes of edification, to ring the changes of moral censure.

CHAP. XIV.
1811.
Sir T. Lawrence.

June 18th.—Accompanied Mrs. Pattisson and her son William to Lawrence the painter. On entering the room, he fixed his eyes on William with evident admiration, not noticing the mother, who had been handsome. On my asking him whether he could find time to paint the boy he said in a half-whisper, "To be sure, he must be painted." The picture was to include his brother Jacob. It was arranged that the two boys should wait on Mr. Lawrence on Wednesday, the 26th inst.

William and Jacob Pattisson.

I may here mention an occurrence which took place in 1809, while I was at Witham on a visit to the Pattissons. There was a grand jubilee to celebrate the termination of the fiftieth year of the reign of George III. At morning prayers, William, aged eight, said, "Mamma, ought I not to pray for the King?"—"To be sure, if you feel the desire." On which he folded his hands, and said, "O God, grant that the King may continue to reign with justice and victory." The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when Jacob, then six years and a half, said "Mayn't I pray too?" The mother could not refuse. "O God, be so good as to let the King live another fifty years."

June 21st.—A pleasant party at Collier's. Lamb in high spirits. One pun from him at least successful. Punsters being abused, and the old joke repeated that he who puns will pick a pocket, some one said, "Punsters themselves have no pockets."—"No," said Lamb, "they carry only a ridicule."

June 26th.—Went with the Pattissons to Lawrence's. He consented to paint the two boys for 160 guineas. They had their first sitting to-day. I took an opportunity of telling him an anecdote respecting himself, which did not seem to displease him, though eminent men are in many instances well pleased to forget the day of little things. His father was the master of the Bear Inn at Devizes, and he himself was for a short time at Mr. Fenner's school. Some time between 1786 and 1789 a stranger, calling at Mr. Fenner's, remarked, "They say, Mr. Fenner, that your old pupil, Tommy Lawrence, is turning out a very pretty painter."

Anecdote of Bishop of Llandaff and Lord Southampton.

July 9th.—Evening at Lady Broughton's. W. Maltby, in our walk home, related an anecdote which he himself had from the Bishop of Llandaff. The Bishop was standing in the House of Lords, in company with Lords Thurlow and Loughborough, when Lord Southampton accosted him: "I want your advice, my Lord; how am I to bring up my son so as to make him get forwards in the world?"—"I know of but one way," replied the Bishop; "give him parts and poverty."—"Well, then," replied Lord S., "if God has given him parts, I will manage as to the poverty."

Anecdote of Bishop Burnet and Lord Bolingbroke.

July 11th.—Called on Mrs. Barbauld, Mr. and Miss Belsham, and Mr. and Mrs. Tooke, Senr. Tooke told a good story. Lord Bolingbroke dined one day with Bishop Burnet. There was a sumptuous entertainment, and Lord Bolingbroke asked the Bishop whether the Apostles fared so well. "Oh no, my lord."—"And how do you account for the difference between the clergy of the present day and those of the primitive church?"—"It is so," replied Burnet, "on all occasions; we always see that inventors and speculators are ruined, while others reap the gain." But surely the repartee is applied to the wrong person. Burnet would not have so compromised himself to Bolingbroke.

CHAP. XIV.
1811.

Southey on Blake.

July 24th.—Late at C. Lamb's. Found a large party there. Southey had been with Blake, and admired both his designs and his poetic talents. At the same time he held him to be a decided madman. Blake, he said, spoke of his visions with the diffidence which is usual with such people, and did not seem to expect that he should be believed. He showed Southey a perfectly mad poem, called "Jerusalem." Oxford Street is in Jerusalem.

The play of the Quadrupeds.

July 26th.—At the Lyceum Theatre with Amyot. "The Quadrupeds," otherwise the Tailors, revived under a new name. The prelude represents a poor manager in distress. He is assailed by a bailiff, and, leading him to a trap-door, forces him down. Sheridan looked on, and clapped. The burlesque scene between the master-tailor (Lovegrove) and his wife (Miss Kelly), who is alarmed by a dream, was excellent.

Coleridge.

July 28th.—After dinner walked to Morgan's, beyond Kensington, to see Coleridge, and found Southey there. Coleridge, talking of German poetry, represented Klopstock as compounded of everything bad in Young, Harvey, and Richardson. He praised warmly an essay on Hogarth by C. Lamb, and spoke of wrongers of subjects as well as writers on them. He was in spirits, and was apparently pleased with a letter I brought him from Mrs. Clarkson.

Coleridge and Southey spoke of Thelwall, calling him merely "John." Southey said, "He is a good-hearted man; besides, we ought never to forget that he was once as near as possible being hanged, and there is some merit in that."

Southey.

Enjoyed exceedingly my walk back with Southey. Speaking of forms of government, he said, there is no doubt a republic is the best form of government in itself—as a sun-dial is in itself the most certain and perfect instrument for ascertaining the hour. And if the sun shone always, men would never have been at the trouble of making clocks. But, as it is, these instruments are in most frequent use. If mankind were illuminated by the pure sun of reason, they would dispense with complicated forms of government. He talked largely about Spain. A Jacobin revolution must purify the country before any good can be done. Catholicism is absolutely incompatible with great improvements. In the Cortes, he says, nine-tenths of the members are bigoted papists, and one-tenth Jacobin atheists. Barcelona might have been purchased, had our Government been on the alert. Southey spoke highly of Blanco White.

Thalaba and Castle of Indolence.

July 29th.—Read four books of "Thalaba," and one book of the "Castle of Indolence." Thomson's poem most delightful. Surely, in the finish of such a work, there is a charm which surpasses the effect produced by the fitful and irregular beauties of a work like Southey's.

August 3rd.—Bathed for the first time in Peerless Pool, originally perilous pool; but it deserves neither title. In the evening at Charles Lamb's. He was

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

C. Lamb on Coleridge.

serious, and therefore very interesting. I accidentally made use of the expression "poor Coleridge!" Lamb corrected me, not angrily, but as if really pained. "He is," he said, "a fine fellow, in spite of all his faults and weaknesses. Call him Coleridge; I hate poor, as applied to such a man. I can't bear to hear such a man pitied." He then quoted an expression to the same effect by (I think) Ben Jonson of Bacon.

The Courier.

The Times.

*Reminiscences.—I frequently saw Coleridge about this time, and was made privy to an incident which need no longer be kept a secret. Coleridge was then a contributor to the Courier, and wrote an article on the Duke of York, which was printed on Friday, the 5th of July. But the Government got scent of it, and therefore, by the interference of Mr. Arbuthnot of the Treasury, after about 2,000 copies had been printed, it was suppressed. This offended Coleridge, who would gladly have transferred his services to the Times. I spoke about him to Walter, but Fraser was then firmly established, and no other hand was required for the highest department. I have found a paper in Coleridge's hand in reference to this affair. It states what service he was willing to render,—such as attending six hours a day, and writing so many articles per week. One paragraph only has any significance, because it shows the state of his mind: "The above, always supposing the paper to be truly independent, first, of the Administration, secondly, of Palace Yard, and that its fundamental principle is, the due proportion of political power to property, joined with the removal of all obstacles to the free circulation and transfer of property, and all artificial facilitations of its natural tendency to accumulate in large and growing masses."

* Written in 1849.

At C. Lamb's.

August 8th.—At C. Lamb's. Coleridge there. A short but interesting conversation on German metaphysics. He related some curious anecdotes of his son Hartley, whom he represented as a most remarkable child. A deep thinker in his infancy—one who tormented himself in his attempts to solve the problems which would equally torment the full-grown man, if the world and its cares and its pleasures did not abstract his attention. When about five years old, Hartley was asked a question concerning himself by some one who called him "Hartley."—"Which Hartley?" asked the boy.—"Why, is there more than one Hartley?"—"Yes, there's a deal of Hartleys."—"How so?"—"There's Picture Hartley (Hazlitt had painted a portrait of him), and Shadow Hartley, and there's Echo Hartley, and there's Catch-me-fast Hartley,"—at the same time seizing his own arm with the other hand very eagerly, an action which shows that his mind must have been led to reflect on what Kant calls the great and inexplicable mystery that man should be both his own subject and object, and that these should yet be one. "At the same early age," said Coleridge, "he used to be in an agony of thought about the reality of existence. Some one said to him, 'It is not now, but it is to be.'—'But,' said he, 'if it is to be, it is.' Perhaps this confusion of thought lay not merely in the imperfection of language. Hartley, when Coleridge's anecdotes of his son Hartley.

Chap. xiv. — 1811.

a boy, had no pleasure in things; they made no impression on him till they had undergone a sort of process in his mind, and become thoughts or feelings." With a few abatements for fatherly affection, I have no doubt Hartley is a remarkable child. But of his subsequent progress Coleridge said little.

At Dr. Aikin's.

August 17th.—Tea at Dr. Aikin's. Found the Dr., Miss Aikin, &c., very agreeable. Indeed there has seemed to me of late less to dislike in the political and religious opinions of this circle than I thought formerly. A successful game of chess with Miss Aikin, which I proposed as a sort of ordeal to test whether I was right in recommending "Benvenuto Cellini" for its interest and beauty, or she in sending it home with disgust.

Walter Scott's Minstrelsy.

Early at home. Read Scott's note on Fairies in the "Minstrelsy." A shallow and unsatisfactory essay. The subject is so interesting, that nothing can be altogether unattractive that treats of it. A work at once critical and philosophical, on the popular superstitions of mankind in different ages, would be most curious. It would embrace a vast mass of important matter, closely connected with philosophy and religion. Scott's collection, vol. ii., contains much that is valuable and beautiful. "Tamlane" is one of the best poems. It has the levity and grace of a genuine fairy fiction, and at the same time there is about it a tone of earnestness which suits a legend of popular belief. In "Thomas the Rhymer," the enigmatic lines which speak of our national and distinctive character and glory, ought to become popular:

> "The waters worship shall his race;
> Likewise the waves of the farthest sea;
> For they shall ride over ocean wide
> With hempen bridles, and horse of tree."

Sir T. Lawrence's picture of the Pattissons.

August 23rd.—A run up to Lawrence's. He has made a most delightful picture of William and Jacob Pattisson. The heads only are finished. William's is a side-face—very beautiful, but certainly not more so than the original. Jacob is a smiling, open-faced boy, with an admirably sweet expression. William has had justice done him. More was not to be expected of any mortal colours. Jacob has had more than justice done him, but not in a way that can fairly be a matter of reproach. If the artist has idealized somewhat, and given an expression which is not on the boy's face every day, still he has not given a grace or a charm which lies not in his moral frame. He has no more said in his picture the thing that is not, than the magnifying glass, which never invents, or gives more or other objects than there really are, but merely assists the infirm optics of the beholder. William is painted without any momentary expression, i.e. he does not appear, like Jacob, to be under an immediate inspiring influence, which occasions an arch smile not likely to be permanent even on the cheeks of Robin Goodfellow himself.*

Incledon.

October 15th.—Journey to London. Incledon the singer was in the coach, and I found him just the man I should have expected. Seven rings on his fingers,

* After a long interval the picture was finished, and exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1817, No. 44 of the Catalogue, as "Portraits of the Sons of W. Pattisson, Esq. Sir T. Lawrence, R.A." It was subsequently engraved by John Bromley, in mezzotint, under the title of "Rural Amusement."

five seals on his watch-ribbon, and a gold snuff-box, at once betrayed the old beau. I spoke in terms of rapture of Mrs. Siddons. He replied, "Ah! Sally's a fine creature. She has a charming place on the Edgeware Road. I dined with her last year, and she paid me one of the finest compliments I ever received. I sang 'The Storm' after dinner. She cried and sobbed like a child. Taking both of my hands, she said, 'All that I and my brother ever did is nothing compared with the effect you produce!'" Incledon spoke with warmth and apparent knowledge on church music, praising Purcell especially, and mentioning Luther's simple hymns. I was forced to confess that I had no ear for music, and he, in order to try me, sang in a sort of song-whisper some melodies which I certainly enjoyed, —more, I thought, than anything I had heard from him on the stage. He related two anecdotes that had no reference to himself. Garrick had a brother living in the country, who was an idolatrous admirer of his genius. A rich neighbour, a grocer, being about to visit London, this brother insisted on his taking a letter of introduction to the actor. Not being able to make up his mind to visit the great man the first day, the grocer went to the play in the evening, and saw Garrick in Abel Drugger. On his return to the country, the brother eagerly inquired respecting the visit he had been so anxious to bring about. "Why, Mr. Garrick," said the good man, "I am sorry to hurt your feelings, but there's your letter. I did not choose to deliver it."—"Not deliver it!" exclaimed the other, in astonishment.—"I happened to see him when he did not know me, and I saw that he was such a dirty, low-lived fellow, that I did not like to have anything to do with him." Foote went to Ireland, and took off F——, the celebrated Dublin printer. F—— stood the jest for some time, but found at last that Foote's imitations became so popular, and drew such attention to himself, that he could not walk the streets without being pointed at. He bethought himself of a remedy. Collecting a number of boys, he gave them a hearty meal, and a shilling each for a place in the gallery, and promised them another meal on the morrow if they would hiss off the scoundrel who turned him into ridicule. The injured man learnt from his friends that Foote was received that night better than ever. Nevertheless, in the morning, the ragged troop of boys appeared to demand their recompense, and when the printer reproached them for their treachery, their spokesman said, "Plase yer honour, we did all we could, for the actor-man had heard of us, and did not come at all at all. And so we had nobody to hiss. But when we saw yer honour's own dear self come on, we did clap, indeed we did, and showed you all the respect and honour in our power. And so yer honour won't forget us because yer honour's enemy was afraid to come, and left yer honour to yer own dear self."

Anecdote of Garrick.

Anecdote of Foote.

October 22nd.—Called on Godwin. Curran, the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, was with him. Curran told an anecdote of an Irish Parliament-man who was boasting in the House of Commons of his attachment to the trial by jury. "Mr. Speaker, with the trial by jury I have lived, and, by the blessing of God, with the trial by jury will I die!" Curran sat near him, and Curran.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

whispered audibly, "What, Jack, do you mean to be hanged?"

Bishop of Norwich.

November 4th.—Hab.* told me that Clarkson had lately been to see the Bishop of Norwich, Bathurst. He found him very liberal indeed. He told Clarkson that one of his clergymen had written to him to complain that a Mr. Dewhurst had opened a meeting in his parish and was preaching against him. "I wrote him word," said the Bishop, "that he must preach against Mr. Dewhurst. I could not help him."

Anecdote of a dancing-master.

November 13th.—Fraser related a humorous story of his meeting in a stage-coach with a little fellow who was not only very smart and buckish in his dress, but also a pretender to science and philosophy. He spoke of having been at Paris, and of having read Helvetius, Voltaire, &c., and was very fluent in his declamation on the origin of ideas, self-love, and the other favourite doctrines of the new school. He said, "I have no objection to confess myself a materialist." On this an old man, who had listened for a long time to the discourse, and had more than once betrayed symptoms of dissatisfaction and scorn towards the philosopher, could not contain himself any longer. "D—— it, that's too bad! You have the impudence to say you are a materialist, when I know you are a dancing-master." The voluble orator was dumb-foundered, and Fraser could not restrain the most violent laughter, which mortally offended the cutter of capers. "It is too bad," muttered the old man, who did not comprehend the cause of Fraser's

* H. C. R.'s brother, Habakkuk.

merriment, "it is too bad for a man to say he is of one trade when he is of another."

CHAP. XIV.

1811.

Coleridge's discursiveness.

December 5th.—Accompanied Mrs. Rutt to Coleridge's lecture.* In this he surpassed himself in the art of talking in a very interesting way, without speaking at all on the subject announced. According to advertisement, he was to lecture on "Romeo and Juliet," and Shakespeare's female characters. Instead of this he began with a defence of school-flogging, in preference at least to Lancaster's mode of punishing, without pretending to find the least connection between that topic and poetry. Afterwards he remarked on the character of the age of Elizabeth and James I., as compared with that of Charles I.; distinguished not very clearly between wit and fancy; referred to the different languages of Europe; attacked the fashionable notion concerning poetic diction; ridiculed the tautology of Johnson's line, "If observation, with extensive view," &c.; and warmly defended Shakespeare against the charge of impurity. While Coleridge was commenting on Lancaster's mode of punishing boys, Lamb whispered: "It is a pity he did not leave this till he got to 'Henry VI.,'

* This course of lectures was delivered at the room of the London Philosophical Society, Scots Corporation Hall, Crane Court, Fleet Street. The first lecture was delivered on the 18th of November. Mr. Robinson attended the greater part of the course, but, through absence from London, was not present at the whole. The subject announced was: "Shakespeare and Milton, in Illustration of the Principles of Poetry, and their Application as Grounds of Criticism to the most Popular Works of later English Poets, those of the Living included." Of these lectures, fifteen in number, Mr. J. P. Collier took notes in short-hand, but the notes of all excepting the first, second, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and twelfth were lost. Those notes which were preserved were published in 1856: "Seven Lectures on Shakespeare and Milton. By the late S. T. Coleridge." By J. P. Collier, Esq.

Chap. xiv. — 1811.

for then he might say he could not help taking part against the Lancastrians." Afterwards, when Coleridge was running from topic to topic, Lamb said, "This is not much amiss. He promised a lecture on the Nurse in 'Romeo and Juliet,' and in its place he has given us one in the manner of the Nurse."

Mrs. Clarkson to H. C. R.

Dec. 5th, 1811.

Letter from Mrs. Clarkson.

Do give me some account of Coleridge. I guess you drew up the account in the Times of the first lecture. I do hope he will have steadiness to go on with the lectures to the end. It would be so great a point gained, if he could but pursue one object without interruption. . . . . . . I remember a beautiful expression of Patty Smith's, after describing a visit at Mr. Wilberforce's: "To know him," she said, "all he is, and to see him with such lively childish spirits, one need not say, 'God bless him!'—he seems already in the fulness of every earthly gift." . . . . . Of all men, there seems most need to say "God bless poor Coleridge!" One could almost believe that an enchanter's spell was upon him, forcing him to be what he is, and yet leaving him the power of showing what he might be.

* * * * * *

Coleridge's lectures.

December 9th.—Accompanied Mrs. Rough to Coleridge's seventh and incomparably best lecture. He declaimed with great eloquence about love, without wandering from his subject, "Romeo and Juliet." He was spirited, methodical, and, for the greater part, intelligible, though profound. Drew up for the Morning Chronicle a hasty report, which was inserted.

10*th*.—Miss Lamb dined with us. In the evening Charles Lamb, Manning, and Mrs. Fenwick. A pleasant evening. Lamb spoke well about Shakespeare. I had objected to Coleridge's assertion, that Shakespeare, as it were, identified himself with everything except the vicious; and I observed that if Shakespeare's becoming a character is to be determined by the truth and vivacity of his delineation, he had become some of the vicious characters as well as the virtuous. Lamb justified Coleridge's remark, by saying that Shakespeare never gives characters wholly odious and detestable. I adduced the King in "Hamlet" as altogether mean; and he allowed this to be the worst of Shakespeare's characters. He has not another like it. I cited Lady Macbeth. "I think this one of Shakespeare's worst characters," said Lamb. "It is also inconsistent with itself. Her sleep-walking does not suit so hardened a being." It occurs to me, however, that this very sleep-walking is, perhaps, the vindication of Shakespeare's portraiture of the character, as thereby the honour of human nature, if I may use the expression, is saved. The voluntary actions and sentiments of Lady Macbeth are all inhuman, but her involuntary nature rises up against her habitual feelings, which sprang out of depraved passions. Hence, though while awake she is a monster, she is a woman in her sleep. I then referred to the Bastard in "Lear," but Lamb considered his character as the result of provocation on account of his illegitimacy. Lamb mentioned Iago and Talk with Charles Lamb about Shakespeare.

Lady Macbeth.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811. King John.

Richard III. as admirable illustrations of the skill with which Shakespeare could make his worst characters interesting. I noticed King John and Lewis, as if Shakespeare meant, like a Jacobin, to show how base kings are. Lamb did not remark on this, but said "'King John' is one of the plays I like least." He praised "Richard II."

Richard II.

Parkin.

December 11th.—In the evening with Lamb at tea. An hour's call on Parkin. I was sorry to find that he was hurt by my mode of replying to him last Friday at the Academical Society. He thought that, though I spoke of him in words very handsomely, there was yet in my manner something which implied a want of moral esteem. I believe I satisfied him of his mistake; but I know my easily besetting sin, of unconsciously assuming an offensive tone on such occasions, and I will, if possible, be on my guard that my manner may not give pain when what I say is substantially innocent. Parkin mentioned that, in a letter to the Editor of the Eclectic Review, Coleridge had declared his adherence to the principles of Bull and Waterland. There are, I know, some persons who deem Coleridge hardly sincere; I believe him to be only inconsistent. I certainly am altogether unable to reconcile his metaphysical and empirico-religious opinions.

Coleridge.

December 12th.—Tea with Mrs. Flaxman, who accompanied me to Coleridge's lecture. He unhappily relapsed into his desultory habit, and delivered, I think, his worst lecture. He began with identifying religion with love, delivered a rhapsody on brotherly and sisterly love, which seduced him into a dissertation on incest. I at last lost all power of attending to him.

H. C. R. to Mrs. Clarkson.

56 Hatton Garden,

Nov. 29th, 1811.

My dear Friend,

Of course you have already heard of the lectures on poetry which Coleridge is now delivering, and I fear have begun to think me inattentive in not sending you some account of them. Yesterday he delivered the fourth, and I could not before form anything like an opinion of the probable result. Indeed, it is hardly otherwise now with me, but were I to wait till I could form a judgment, the very subject itself might escape from observation. He has about 150 hearers on an average. The lectures have been brilliant, that is, in passages; but I doubt much his capacity to render them popular. Or rather, I should say, I doubt any man's power to render a system of philosophy popular which supposes so much unusual attention and rare faculties of thinking even in the hearer. The majority of what are called sensible and thinking men have, to borrow a phrase from Coleridge, "the passion of clear ideas;" and as all poets have a very opposite passion—that of warm feelings and delight in musing over conceptions and imaginings beyond the reach of the analytic faculty—no wonder there is a sort of natural hostility between these classes of minds. This will ever be a bar to Coleridge's extensive popularity. Besides which, he has certain unfortunate habits, which he will not Coleridge as a lecturer.

Chap. xiv.
—
1811.

(perhaps *can*not) correct, very detrimental to his interests—I mean the vices of apologizing, anticipating, and repeating. We have had four lectures, and are still in the Prolegomena to the Shakespearian drama. When we are to begin Milton, I have no idea. With all these defects, there will always be a small circle who will listen with delight to his eloquent effusions (for that is the appropriate expression). I have not missed a lecture, and have each time left the room with the satisfaction which the hearkening to the display of truth in a beautiful form always gives. I have a German friend who attends also, and who is delighted to find the logic and the rhetoric of his country delivered in a foreign language. There is no doubt that Coleridge's mind is much more German than English. My friend has pointed out striking analogies between Coleridge and German authors whom Coleridge has never seen. . . . . . .

German character of Coleridge's mind.

H. C. R. to Mrs. Clarkson.

56, Hatton Garden,
Dec. 13*th,* 1811.

My Dear Friend,

Letter on Coleridge's lectures.

. . . . Yesterday I should have been able to send you a far more pleasant letter than I can possibly furnish you with now; for I should then have had to speak of one of the most gratifying and delightful exertions of Coleridge's mind on Monday last; and now I am both pained and provoked by as unworthy a sequel to his preceding lecture. And you know it is a law of our nature,

"As high as we have mounted in delight,
In our dejection do we sink as low."

CHAP. XIV.
—
1811.

You have so beautifully and exactly expressed the sentiment that every considerate and kind observer of your friend must entertain, that it is quite needless to give you any account of his lectures with a view to direct any judgment you might wish to form, or any feeling you might be disposed to encourage. You will, I am sure, anticipate the way in which he will execute his lectures. As evidences of splendid talent, original thought, and rare powers of expression and fancy, they are all his admirers can wish; but as a discharge of his undertaking, a fulfilment of his promise to the public, they give his friends great uneasiness. As you express it, "an enchanter's spell seems to be upon him," which takes from him the power of treating upon the only subject his hearers are anxious he should consider, while it leaves him infinite ability to riot and run wild on a variety of moral and religious themes. In his sixth lecture he was, by advertisement, to speak of "Romeo and Juliet" and Shakespeare's females; unhappily, some demon whispered the name of Lancaster in his ear: and we had, in one evening, an attack on the poor Quaker, a defence of boarding-school flogging, a parallel between the ages of Elizabeth and Charles, a defence of what is untruly called unpoetic language, an account of the different languages of Europe, and a vindication of Shakespeare against the imputation of grossness!!! I suspect he did discover that offence was taken at this, for his succeeding lecture on Monday was all we could wish. He confined himself to "Romeo and Juliet" for a time, treated of the inferior characters, and delivered a most eloquent discourse on love, with a promise to point out how Shakespeare had shown the same truths in the persons of the lovers. Yesterday we were to have a continuation of the theme. Alas! Coleridge began with a parallel between religion and love, which, though one of his favourite themes, he did not manage successfully. Romeo and Juliet were forgotten. And in the next lecture we are really to hear something of these lovers. Now this will be the fourth time that his hearers have been invited expressly to hear of this play. There are to be only fifteen lectures altogether (half have been delivered), and the course is to include Shakespeare and Milton, the modern poets, &c.!!! Instead of a lecture on a definite subject, we have an immethodical rhapsody, very delightful to you and me, and only offensive from the certainty that it may and ought to offend those who come with other expectations. Yet, with all this, I cannot but be charmed with these splendida vitia, and my chief displeasure is occasioned by my being forced to hear the strictures of persons infinitely below Coleridge, without any power of refuting or contradicting them. Yet it is lucky he has hitherto omitted no lecture. Living with the Morgans, they force him to come with them to the lecture-room, and this is a great point gained. . . . .

Coleridge as a lecturer.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

Godwin.

December 15th.—Called on Godwin, who thinks Coleridge's lectures far below his conversation. So far from agreeing with Coleridge, that Shakespeare's plays ought only to be read and not acted, Godwin said, "No plays but Shakespeare's deserve to be represented, so admirably fitted are his for performance."

Coleridge.

16*th.*—Took Miss Flaxman to Coleridge's lecture. Very desultory again at first, but when about half way through, he bethought himself of Shakespeare; and though he forgot at last what we had been four times in succession to hear, viz. of Romeo and Juliet as lovers, yet he treated beautifully of the "Tempest," and especially Prospero, Miranda, Ariel, and Caliban. This part most excellent.

Mr. Nash Senr.

Christmas Day (at Royston).—A very agreeable tête-à-tête walk with Mr. Nash, Senr., round his farm. I enjoyed his society with more relish, probably, than I ever shall again. He is getting old, though, excepting in the decline of his memory, there are no traces yet of bodily infirmity. Sometimes, however, the effects of old age throw a tender grace over men of his amiable and excellent character. In his youth he was a Methodist, and he was industrious, patient, abstinent, capable of continuous labour, mental and bodily. His education was not of a superior kind, but he had the advantage of great personal beauty, as well as ability in business. He was brought up to the law, and had offers of a partnership in London; but these he declined because he saw practices of which his conscience disapproved. Marrying early, he settled down as a country practitioner. In religious opinions he became a Unitarian, and Robert Robinson* was the object of his admiration. His single

* An eminent Dissenting Minister of Cambridge. Born 1735. Died 1790. His immediate successor was the Rev. Robert Hall.

Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Robert Robinson were written by publication, in which he called himself "A Country Attorney," was one of the hundred-and-one answers to Burke on the French Revolution. His life was prosperous, and alike honourable to himself and, within his limited sphere, useful to others. The latter days of a good man are not a melancholy object, even when one thinks that his moral and intellectual qualities might have been more advantageously employed in a wider field. This alone renders departing excellence a subject of melancholy observation.*

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

A scandal on Quakers.

December 28th.—A gossip with E. till late. He related a curious Quaker anecdote, which suggests a law question. One friend, a merchant, proposes to another, an underwriter, to insure his ship, lost or not lost, which ought soon to arrive. The underwriter hesitates, takes the policy home, and says, "I will return it to-morrow, signed or unsigned." Early in the morning the merchant receives intelligence of the loss of his vessel. He knows his religious brother, and sends a clerk (who is ignorant of the loss) to say, "Neighbour A. informs thee that if thou hast not underwritten, thou needest not do it." The underwriter draws the inference that the vessel is safe. He has not actually signed, but pretending to look for the policy, contrives to sign it by stealth, and says to the clerk, "Tell thy master I had signed." E. assured me that this was a real occurrence.

Coleridge's lecture.

December 30th.—Attended Coleridge's lecture, in which he kept to his subject. He intimated to me his George Dyer. This biography was pronounced by Wordsworth to be one of the best in the English language. See also p. 156.

* See ante, pp. 35, 293.

intention to deliver two lectures on Milton. As he had written to me about his dilemma, having so much to do in so little time, I gently hinted in my reply at his frequent digressions—those splendida peccata which his friends best apologized for by laying the emphasis on the adjective.

Flaxman.

December 31*st.*—In the evening at a very pleasant party at Flaxman's. A Mrs. Wilkinson there with her son, a most interesting young man, with one of those expressive countenances which imply intellect and heart alike. Flaxman admires him much, and says he would prefer him as a son to all the young men he ever saw.

*Rem.—Closed the year most agreeably, in the act, I believe, of repeating to Mr. Flaxman Charles Lamb's prologue to "Mr. H." The society I beheld at the dawn of the New Year consisted of people possessing as high moral and intellectual excellences combined as are to be found in this great city.

Determination to study for the Bar.

I had now made up my mind to study for the Bar. This resolution was formed through an apparently insignificant occurrence. It was on the 1st of March, when my sister (who with my brother had been on a visit to London) was about to leave, that Mr. Collier received an application from York to send down a reporter for the State Trials there. He requested me to go, but I declined on the ground of the objection taken to reporters being called to the Bar. Speaking of this to my sister,† she said, "For a man who has the repute of having sense, you act very like a fool. You decline reporting because that might be an obstacle to your being called to the Bar, and yet you take no steps towards being called to the Bar. Now, do one or the other. Either take to newspaper employment, or study the Law at once, and lose no more time." There was no reply to such a remonstrance. On the Sunday following, I went to Amyot to consult with him. There was then visiting him a Norwich attorney, Mr. Adam Taylor, who strongly advised me to go to the Bar, adding, "There is an opening on the Norfolk circuit. I am sure you would succeed. You shall have such business as I have, and as I can obtain." It was this that more than anything determined me. My old acquaintance, Walter Wright, my new acquaintance, Serjeant Rough, and my friend Anthony Robinson,* all supported me in the resolution ; but perhaps they all feel as Benvenuto Cellini felt on a similar occasion : "Have you, my lord, really bought the picture, or do you only think of buying it ?"—"What has that to do with your opinion, Cellini?" —"A great deal. If you have really bought the picture, then I have only to make such remarks as will render

* Written in 1849. † Mrs. Thomas Robinson.

Chap. xiv. — 1811.

Sisterly counsel.

* Anthony Robinson (born in 1762), was originally brought up in connection with the Established Church; but, changing his opinions, was educated at Bristol for the Dissenting ministry. Robert Hall was one of his fellow-students. He did not long remain in the ministry, but entered into business as a sugar-refiner, in which he continued till his death. Though, however, he professed to be merely a tradesman, he yet retained a lively interest in social and religious questions, and was a steady and active supporter of civil and religious liberty. He published several pamphlets and articles in reviews. Among the former was an able examination of Robert Hall's celebrated "Sermon on Modern Infidelity." H. C. R. said of him, "as I scarcely ever knew Anthony Robinson's equal in colloquial eloquence, in acuteness and skill, and promptitude in debate, so I never knew his superior in candour and sincerity." Between H. C. R. and his friend there was no relationship, though they have the same surname.

you satisfied with your bargain; but if you are only thinking of buying it, then it is my duty to tell you my real opinion."

H. C. R. to his Brother.

56, Hatton Garden,
14*th March,* 1811.

Dear Thomas,

I have at length (after hesitating only from twelve to thirteen years) made up my mind to abandon all my hobby-horsical and vain, idle, and empty literary pursuits, and devote myself to the Law. It is now ten days since I have given words and form to this determination, which an accident after all has occasioned me to make. My sister, perhaps, told you of a proposal Mr. Collier made me, that I should go to York to transact a business which certainly would not agree with the professional character. But my sister did not tell you, because she was not herself aware of the fact, that it was a simple sentence which dropped from her, which made me sensible (more strongly than I had ever been before) of the extreme folly of my conduct. As we were walking down to the Inn on Saturday morning she said—There is something very inconsistent in your behaviour. You refuse a profitable job, because it is incompatible with the character of a barrister, and yet you cannot be made to open a law-book. Now, you ought to do one or the other. Make up your mind at least.

Announcement of intention to study for the Bar.

* * * * * *

Your affectionate brother,

H. C. R.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

Amatonda.

In the Spring, and just before I was induced seriously to prepare for being called to the Bar, I translated "Amatonda," a fairy tale by Anton Wall.* I have already given some account of the work itself.† My translation was published by Longman, but I believe fell dead from the press. None but friends ever praised it. I have a letter of praise from Coleridge. And Lamb at least liked the translations from Jean Paul (at the end), which were, I believe, the first translations from Jean Paul into English. He said they were the finest things he ever saw from the German language. The book, so far as I know, was never reviewed, and I obtained no credit from my work. Perhaps happily, for it was the failure of my attempt to gain distinction by writing that made me willing to devote myself honestly to the Law, and so saved me from the mortification that follows a little literary success, by which many men of inferior faculties, like myself, have been betrayed into an unwise adoption of literature as a profession, which after this year I never once thought of.

Translation from Jean Paul Richter.

COLERIDGE to H. C. R.

I have to thank you, my dear Robinson, for the pleasure I have enjoyed in the perusal of Anton Wall's delightful tale. I read it first with my eyes only, and only to myself; but the second time aloud to two amiable women. Both times I felt myself in the embrace of the fairy Amatonda. The German critic

* "Amatonda." A tale from the German of Anton Wall. London: Printed for Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, and Brown. 1811.

† See p. 162.

has noticed as a defect and an oversight what I regard as one of the capital beauties of the work, and thus convinced me that for reviewers the world over, and for readers whose intellects are commensurate with theirs, an author must write under his best conceptions. . . . .

Criticism by Coleridge.

I recollect no fairy tale with so just and fine a moral as this of Anton Wall's. Virtue itself, though joined with outward competence, cannot give that happiness which contents the human heart, without love; but love is impossible without virtue,—love, true human love,—i.e. two hearts, like two correspondent concave mirrors having a common focus, while each reflects and magnifies the other, and in the other itself is an endless reduplication by sweet thoughts and sympathies.

* * * * * *

Coleridge on love.

Hassan's love for Amina is beautifully described as having had a foundation from early childhood. And this I many years ago planned as the subject-matter of a poem, viz. long and deep affections suddenly, in one moment, flash-transmuted into love. In short, I believe that love (as distinguished both from lust and that habitual attachment which may include many objects diversifying itself by degrees only), that that feeling (or whatever it may be more aptly called), that specific mode of being, which one object only can possess, and possess totally, is always the abrupt creation of a moment, though years of dawning may have preceded. I said dawning, for often as I have watched the sun rising from the thinning, diluting blue to the whitening, to the fawn-coloured, the pink, the crimson, the glory, yet still the sun itself has always started up out of the horizon! Between the brightest hues of the dawning, and the first rim of the sun itself, there is a chasm—all before were differences of degrees, passing and dissolving into each other—but this is a difference of kind—a chasm of kind in a continuity of time; and as no man who had never watched for the rise of the sun could understand what I mean, so can no man who has not been in love understand what love is, though he will be sure to imagine and believe that he does.

Chap. xiv. — 1811.

On love.

Thus, ——— is by nature incapable of being in love, though no man more tenderly attached; hence he ridicules the existence of any other passion than a compound of lust with esteem and friendship, confined to one object, first by accidents of association, and permanently by the force of habit and a sense of duty. Now this will do very well—it will suffice to make a good husband; it may be even desirable (if the largest sum of easy and pleasurable sensations in this life be the right aim and end of human wisdom) that we should have this, and no more,—but still it is not love—and there is such a passion as love—which is no more a compound than oxygen, though like oxygen it has an almost universal affinity, and a long and finely graduated scale of elective attractions. It combines with lust—but how? Does lust call forth or occasion love? Just as much as the reek of the marsh calls up the sun. The sun calls up the vapour—attenuates, lifts it—it becomes a cloud—and now it is the veil of the divinity; the divinity, transpiercing it at once, hides and declares his presence. We see, we are conscious of light alone; but it is light embodied in the earthly nature, which that light itself awoke and sublimated. What is the body, but the fixture of the mind—the stereotype impression? Arbitrary are the symbols—yet symbols they are. Is terror in my soul?—my heart beats against my side. Is grief?—tears pour in my eyes. In her homely way, the body tries to interpret all the movements of the soul. Shall it not, then, imitate and symbolize that divinest movement of a finite spirit—the yearning to complete itself by union? Is there not a sex in souls? We have all eyes, cheeks, lips—but in a lovely woman are not the eyes womanly—yea, every form, in every motion of her whole frame, womanly? Were there not an identity in the substance, man and woman might join, but they could never unify; were there not throughout, in body and in soul, a corresponding and adapted difference, there might be addition, but there could be no combination. 1 and 1 = 2; but 1 cannot be multiplied into 1: 1 × 1 = 1. At best, it would be an idle echo, the same thing needlessly repeated, as the idiot told the clock—one, one, one, one, &c.

On the body as symbolic of the spirit.

It has just come into my head that this scrawl is very much in the style of Jean Paul. I have not, however, as yet looked into the books you were so kind as to leave with me, further than to see the title-page. If you do not want them for some time, I should be glad to keep them by me, while I read the original works themselves. I pray you procure them for me week by week, and I will promise you most carefully to return them, you allowing me three days for two volumes. I am very anxious to have them, and shall fill one volume of the "Omniana" with the extracts, quoting your criticism as my introduction: only, instead of the shelves or steps, I must put the ladder of a library, or whatever name those movable steps are called which one meets with in all well-furnished libraries.

CHAP. XIV. — 1811.

Coleridge's troubles.

I have been extremely unwell, though rather better. George Burnet's* death told too abruptly, and, in truth, exaggerated, overset my dear, most dear, and most excellent friend and heart's sister, Mary Lamb—and her illness has almost overset me. Troubles, God knows! have thronged upon me—alas! alas! all my dearest friends I have of late either suffered from, or suffered for. 'Tis a cruel sort of world we live in. God bless you

And yours, with affectionate esteem,

S. T. COLERIDGE.

Southampton Buildings.

P.S. I began with the scrap of paper, meaning only to write half a score lines, and now I have written enough for half a dozen letters † unnecessarily, when to have written to half a dozen claimants is a moral (would it were a physical) necessity. But moral obligation is to me so very strong a stimulant, that in nine cases out of ten it acts as a narcotic. The blow that should rouse, stuns me.

[Though Mr. Robinson was never married, some of his friends occasionally volunteered their advice to him on the subject of matrimony. A letter containing such advice belongs to this year, and may be inserted here.—Ed.]

* George Burnet was a very early friend of Coleridge; he joined with him, Southey, and Lovell in the scheme for emigrating to America, and there forming a colony, to be called a Pantisocracy, the main principle of which was a community of goods, and where selfishness was to be proscribed.

† The beginning of the letter is on a scrap, after filling which the writer took a sheet of foolscap.

Capel Lofft to H. C. R.

Oct. 3rd, 1811.

Dear Sir,

Perhaps one man ought never to advise another, unasked; especially when that other is probably better able to advise himself. I do, however, advise you, if ever you marry, never (as a man of feeling, and who loves literature, and liberty, and science) to marry a woman of what is called a strong mind. The love of dominion and the whirlwind of instability are, I fear, inseparable from a female mind of that character. All women and all beings love power; but a woman of a mild and compliant mind seeks and maintains power by correspondent means. These are not called strong minds. No matter, if they are mild, and modest, and delicate, and sympathizing minds, such as the Julie of Rousseau, the Alcestis of Euripides, the Antigone of Sophocles, and the Eve of Milton. Hence every woman should be a lover of music—and of feminine music; and particularly of the vocal. And in that she should cultivate the soft, the low, and the sweet. "Her voice was ever low, gentle, and sweet; an excellent thing in woman," says that great depictor of character, and particularly of women, who has so exquisitely imagined and delineated Miranda, Viola, Ophelia, Desdemona, Cordelia, Helena.

Against strong-minded women.

I am,

Yours, &c.

Capel Lofft.

CHAPTER XV.

1812.

H. C. R. to Mrs. Clarkson.

56, Hatton Garden,
3rd January, 1812.

My dear Friend,

I received your letter last night, and will write the answer immediately, though I cannot forward it till I have seen your brother for your address. I have a better, much better, account to give of Coleridge's lectures than formerly. His last three lectures have, for the greater part, been all that his friends could wish—his admirers expect. Your sister heard the two last, and from her you will learn much more than I could put into a letter, had I all the leisure I now want, or the memory I never had. His disquisitions on the characters of Richard III., Iago, Falstaff, were full of paradox, but very ingenious, and in the main true. His remarks on Richard II. and Hamlet very excellent. Last night he concluded his fine development of the Prince of Denmark by an eloquent statement of the moral of the play. "Action," he said, "is the great end of all; no intellect, however grand, is valuable, if it draw us from action and lead us to think and think till the time of action is passed by, and we can do Coleridge on Richard III., Hamlet, &c.

On action as the end of all.

nothing." Somebody said to me, "This is a satire on himself."—"No," said I, "it is an elegy." A great many of his remarks on Hamlet were capable of a like application. I should add that he means to deliver several lectures beyond the promised number. This will gain him credit in the City-sense of the word; and for the sake of his future success in lecturing, I am very glad he is thus prudent.

Coleridge's lectures.

You see I am looking at the subject from a very low point of view; at the same time I am able to place myself on higher ground, and then I lament equally with the Wordsworths and yourself that such a man should be compelled to have recourse to such means; but, after all, what is there in this lamentation more than a particular instance of the general complaint of all ages, that highmindedness should stoop to vulgarity, that the low wants of man should drag down the elevated to low pursuits, and that the noblest powers of intellect should not be accompanied with meaner but indispensable capacities? *

* * * * * *

January 8th.—Called on Mrs. B., who was in much better spirits than I expected to find her. She spoke of her father with much tenderness and love, but without violent emotion. I referred to my own mother, and the

* Coleridge was sadly annoyed at the necessity of appealing to the kindness of friends. He repeated to me an epigram, of which I recollect only the point: "I fell asleep, and fancied I was surrounded by my friends, who made me marvellous fine promises. I awoke and found these promises as much a dream as if they had actually been made."—H. C. R.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

treasure her memory is to me. Thinking of her and talking of her are a great delight, and I said I knew it would be so also with Mrs. B. The joy is great of having had an excellent parent. This she admitted, and seemed to feel, as if I had touched the true key.

Lecture on Johnson's Preface.

January 9th. — Evening at Coleridge's lecture on Johnson's "Preface." Though sometimes obscure, his many palpable hits must have given general satisfaction.

January 13th.—Accompanied Mrs. C. Aikin to Coleridge's lecture. A continuation of remarks on Johnson's "Preface," but feeble and unmeaning compared with the last. The latter part of the lecture very excellent. It was on "Lear," in which he vindicated the melancholy catastrophe, and on "Othello," in which he expressed the opinion that Othello is not a jealous character.

On Lear and Othello.

Hazlitt's lecture.

January 14th.—Heard Hazlitt's first lecture on the "History of English Philosophy."* He seems to have no conception of the difference between a lecture and a book. What he said was sensible and excellent, but he delivered himself in a low monotonous voice, with his eyes fixed on his MS., not once daring to look at his audience; and he read so rapidly that no one could possibly give to the matter the attention it required. †

* These lectures were delivered at the Russell Institution.

† Hazlitt had in vain striven to become a painter. He had obtained the patronage of Clarkson, who said he had heard Hazlitt was more able to paint like Titian than any living painter. Some one had said that his portrait of Lamb had a Titianesque air about it. And certainly this is the only painting by Hazlitt I ever saw with pleasure. He made a portrait of my brother, which he knew to be bad, and it was destroyed.—H. C. R.

January 15th.—Tea with the Lambs. An evening at cards. Hazlitt there, much depressed. He seemed disposed to give up the lectures altogether. The cause of his reading so rapidly was, that he was told to limit himself to an hour, and what he had prepared would have taken three hours, if it had been read slowly.

Coleridge's lecture.

January 16th.—At Coleridge's lecture. He reviewed Johnson's "Preface," and vindicated warmly Milton's moral and political character, but I think with less than his usual ability. He excited a hiss once by calling Johnson a fellow, for which he happily apologized by observing that it is in the nature of evil to beget evil, and that we are thus apt to fall into the fault we censure. He remarked on Milton's minor poems, and the nature of blank verse. The latter half of the lecture was very good.

Anecdotes of Coleridge.

January 17th.—Dinner at J. Buck's.* Mr. and Mrs. Buck, Coleridge, the Gores, Jameson, and Aders.† Coleridge was less profound than usual, but exceedingly agreeable. He related anecdotes of himself. Once he was arrested as a spy at Fort St. George. The Governor, as soon as he saw him, muttered, "an ill-looking fellow." At first everything that Coleridge could say for himself was ingeniously perverted and applied against him; but at length a card he accidentally had by him, from a person of quality, convinced the Governor that he was a gentleman, and procured for him an invitation to breakfast next morning. Coleridge then took an opportunity of asking the Governor what it was in his appearance that induced him to say "an ill-looking fellow." "My dear sir," said the Governor, squeezing him by the hand, "I nearly lost my sight in the West Indies, and cannot see a yard before me." At Bristol, Coleridge delivered lectures in conjunction with Southey. A fellow who was present hissed him, and an altercation ensued. The man sneered at him for professing public principle, and asked, "Why, if you have so much public spirit, do you take money at the door?"—"For a reason," answered Coleridge, "which I am sorry in the present instance has not been quite successful—to keep out blackguards." In reference to the schools of Lancaster and Bell—a delicate subject in such a society—Coleridge contented himself with urging that it is unsafe to leave religion untaught while anything is taught. Reading and writing must not be supposed to be in themselves education.

* See p. 30.

† Jameson and Aders were for some time in partnership as merchants. Mr. Aders had a valuable collection of pictures, which are frequently referred to in the diary, and which were eventually sold by auction.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Lamb on Coleridge.

At ten went to Barron Field's.* Charles Lamb and Leigh Hunt there. I found they had had a discussion about Coleridge, whom Hunt had spoken of as a bad writer, while Lamb thought him the first man he ever knew. Lamb, in his droll and extravagant way, abused every one who denied the transcendent merits of Coleridge's writings.

H. C. R. becomes a pupil of Mr. Littledale.

January 20th.—A day of some importance, perhaps, in its consequences. Serjeant Rough introduced me to Mr. Littledale,† whose pupil I became by presenting him with the usual fee of 100 guineas, and by entering at once on my employment.

* Afterwards a Judge in New South Wales, and subsequently at Gibraltar. Some of Lamb's most amusing letters were written to him.

† Afterwards Judge of the Queen's Bench.

In the evening at Coleridge's lecture. Conclusion of Milton. Not one of the happiest of Coleridge's efforts. Rogers was there, and with him was Lord Byron. He was wrapped up, but I recognized his club foot, and, indeed, his countenance and general appearance.

Coleridge's lecture.

January 21*st.*—Hazlitt's second lecture. His delivery vastly improved, and I hope he will now get on. He read at Basil Montagu's last night half his first lecture. He was to read the whole, but abruptly broke off, and could not be persuaded to read the remainder. Lamb and other friends were there.

Hazlitt's lecture.

February 21*st.*—In the evening at the Academical Society. Mr. Sheil spoke, who was black-balled lately after a violent and pompous speech. His present speech was sensible and temperate. Blake, his countryman, watched over him to keep him in order. He spoke as if he had been fed for three weeks on bread and water in order to be tamed.

Sheil.

*Rem.—He was black-balled again on a later occasion. What alone makes this worth mentioning is that he who was twice rejected by an insignificant society of young men is now one of the most popular and admired speakers in the House of Commons, the Right Honourable Richard Lalor Sheil.

February 26*th.*—A dinner-party. Coleridge, Godwin, &c., &c. The company rather too numerous. Coleridge by no means the eloquent man he usually is. It was not till ten minutes before he went away that he fell into a declaiming mood; "having," as Godwin said, "got upon the indefinites and the infinites," viz. the Dinner-party. Godwin and Coleridge.

* Written in 1849.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

nature of religious conviction. He contended that the external evidence of Christianity would be weak but for the internal evidence arising out of the necessity of our nature—our want of religion. He made use of one very happy allusion. Speaking of the mingling of subordinate evils with great good, he said, "though the serpent does twine himself round the staff of the god of healing."*

H. C. R. TO MRS. CLARKSON.

Gray's Inn,† 28th Jan. 1812.

Coleridge.

You will be interested to hear how Coleridge's lectures closed: they ended with éclat. The room was crowded, and the lecture had several passages more than brilliant—they were luminous, and the light gave conscious pleasure to every person who knew that he could both see the glory and the objects around it at once, while (you know) mere splendour, like the patent lamps, presents a flame that only puts out the eyes. Coleridge's explanation of the character of Satan, and his vindication of Milton against the charge of falling below his subject, where he introduces the Supreme Being, and his illustration of the difference between poetic and abstract truth, and of the diversity in identity

On Milton.

* Godwin and Rough met at this party for the first time. The very next day Godwin called on me to say how much he liked Rough, adding, "By-the-by, do you think he would lend me £50 just now, as I am in want of a little money?" He had not left me an hour before Rough came with a like question. He wanted a bill discounted, and asked whether I thought Godwin would do it for him? The habit of both was so well known that some persons were afraid to invite them, lest it should lead to an application for a loan from some friend who chanced to be present.—H. C. R.

† Mr. Littledale's chambers were in Gray's Inn.

between the philosopher and the poet, were equally wise and beautiful. He concluded with a few strokes of satire; but I cannot forgive him for selecting alone (except an attack on Pope's "Homer," qualified by insincere eulogy) Mrs. Barbauld. She is a living writer, a woman, and a person who, however discordant with himself in character and taste, has still always shown him civilities and attentions. It was surely ungenerous. . . . . .

Dinner at Thelwall's.

February 27th.—Coleridge's concluding lecture. A dinner at John Thelwall's. The American poet Northmore there; also the Rev. W. Frend;* George Dyer,† whose gentle manners were a contrast to the slovenliness of his dress; Northcote the painter; and a very interesting man named Nicholson, who has raised himself out of the lowest condition, though not out of poverty, by literary and scientific labours. What he has written (not printed) would fill 300 moderate-sized volumes. For an introduction to Natural Philosophy he received £150. He has the air of a robust man, both in body and in mind.

Young and Kemble.

March 10th.—Mrs. Collier and I went to Covent Garden Theatre. "Julius Cæsar." We were forced to stand all the time. Young as Cassius surpassed Kemble as Brutus. Indeed the whole performance of the latter was cold, stiff, and pedantic. In the quarrel

* The eminent mathematician, and former Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Cambridge. For a pamphlet published by him in 1793, and containing expressions of dislike to the doctrines and discipline of the Established Church, he was, after a trial of eight days by the University authorities, sentenced to banishment from the University. His fellowship he retained till his marriage.

† See page 61.

CHAP. XV.
—
1812.

scene only, his fine figure gave him an advantage over Young. He was once warmly applauded; but, on the whole, Young seemed to be the favourite, and where he instigated Brutus to concur in the plot, he drew down peals of applause. The two orations from the rostrum produced no effect whatever. The architectural scenery was very grand.

Jeremy Bentham.

March 15th.—A pleasant walk to Hampstead. Had much conversation with Hamond. Some years ago he called on Jeremy Bentham without any introduction, merely to obtain the acquaintance of the great man. Bentham at first declined to receive him, but on seeing Hamond's card altered his mind, and an intimacy arose. Bentham himself, when a young man, was so enthusiastic an admirer of Helvetius, that he actually thought of offering himself as a servant to him. "You," said he to Hamond, in reference to his desire, "took a better way." When Hamond told me this, I did not confess that, sixteen years ago, the idea of doing a similar thing floated before my own mind; but I was pleased to find that the same extravagancy of sentiment had affected so superior a man as Bentham.

Flaxman, R.A.

March 16th.—Flaxman's lecture. The short characteristics of the most famous pieces of sculpture of antiquity very interesting. There was not in this, any more than in preceding lectures I have heard from him, great power of discrimination, or much of what in a lower sense is called understanding, though Flaxman's beautiful sense and refined taste are far superior to any understanding the mere critic can possess. The artist needs a different and higher quality—Kunstsinn (feeling for art), and that Flaxman possesses in a greater degree than any other man I know. Returned to Charles Lamb, with whom were Barron Field, Leigh Hunt, and Barnes.* The latter with a somewhat feist appearance, has a good countenance, and is a man who, I dare say, will make his way in the world. He has talents and activity, and inducements to activity. He has obtained high honours at Cambridge, and is now a candidate for a fellowship. He reports for Walter. Charles Lamb was at his best —very good-humoured, but at the same time solid. I never heard him talk to greater advantage. He wrote last week in the Examiner some capital lines, "The Triumph of the Whale,"† and this occasioned the conversation to take more of a political turn than is

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Barnes.

C. Lamb.

* For a long time Editor of the Times.

† Not contained in his published works. H. C. R. says that in Galignani this poem was incorrectly ascribed to Lord Byron. A few lines will serve as a specimen of the kind of wit it contains :—

* * * "Next declare,
Muse, who his companions are.
Every fish of generous kind
Scuds aside, or slinks behind.
* * * * *
For his solace and relief,
Flat-fish are his courtiers chief.
Last and lowest in his train,
Ink-fish, libellers of the main,
Their black venom, shed in spite ;
Such on earth the things that write.
In his stomach, some do say,
No good thing can ever stay.
Had it been the fortune of it
To have swallow'd that old prophet,
Three days there he'd not have dwelled,
But in one had been expelled."

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Leigh Hunt.

usual with Lamb. Leigh Hunt is an enthusiast, very well-intentioned, and I believe prepared for the worst. He said, pleasantly enough, "No one can accuse me of not writing a libel. Everything is a libel, as the law is now declared, and our security lies only in their shame." He talked on the theatre, and showed on such points great superiority over the others.

March 18th.—Evening at Porden's, the Society of the Attic Chest. This is a small society, the members of which send verses, which are put into a box, and afford an evening's amusement at certain intervals. The box was actually made at Athens. Some verses, I suspect by Miss Flaxman, on music, pleased me best. The company was numerous—the Rogets,* Phillips † the painter, and his wife. Old General Franklin, son of the celebrated Benjamin, was of the party. He is eighty-four years of age, has a courtier-like mien, and must have been a very fine man. He is now very animated and interesting, but does not at all answer to the idea one would naturally form of the son of the great Franklin.

General Franklin.

Rem.‡—At these meetings Ellen Porden was generally the reader, and she was herself a writer of poetry. She even ventured to write an epic poem, called "Richard the Second." When she presented a copy to Flaxman, who loved her for her amiable qualities (and more than amiable, for she was a good domestic character, an excellent sister and daughter), he thanked her and said,

* Dr. Roget was the author of "Animal and Vegetable Physiology," one of the Bridgewater Treatises, published in 1834.

† Afterwards R.A., and father of the recent R.A. of that name.

‡ Written in 1849.

"Why, Ellen, my love, you've written a poem longer than Homer." She married Captain, afterwards Sir John Franklin. The marriage took place with an express consent on her part to his making a second voyage of discovery towards the North Pole, if the Government should give its permission. Before he went a daughter was born; but her own health had become so bad that her life was despaired of. I was one of the few friends invited to the last dinner at his house before his departure. Flaxman was of the party, and deeply depressed in spirits. Captain F. took an opportunity in the course of the evening to say to me, "My wife will be left alone with the infant. You will do me a great favour, if you will call on her as often as your engagements permit." I promised. In a few days I went to the Quarter Sessions, and before I returned Mrs. Franklin was dead.

Marriage of Captain Franklin.

Voyage to the North Pole.

March 23rd.—With Lawrence, who showed me a painting of Kemble as Cato, in the last scene, about to inflict on himself the nobile letum. It is a very strong likeness, as well as a very beautiful picture.*

Sir T. Lawrence.

March 26th.—Dined with Messrs. Longman and Co. at one of their literary parties. These parties were famous in their day. Longman himself is a quiet gentlemanly man. There were present Dr. Abraham Rees,† a very good-humoured, agreeable companion, who would in no respect disgrace a mitre; "Russia" Tooke, as he was called; Sharon Turner,‡ a chatty man, and

* This picture was exhibited the same year at Somerset House, No. 57 of the Royal Academy Catalogue.

† His brother was a partner in Longman's house.

‡ The historian.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

pleasant in his talk; Abernethy, who did not say a word; and Dr. Holland,* the Iceland traveller. The only one who said anything worth reporting was Dr. Rees, the well-known Arian, "Encyclopædic Rees." He related that when, in 1788, Beaufoy made his famous attempt to obtain the repeal of the Corporation and Test Act, a deputation waited on the Lord Chancellor Thurlow to obtain his support. The deputies were Drs. Kippis, Palmer (of Hackney), and Rees. The Chancellor heard them very civilly, and then said, "Gentlemen, I'm against you, by G—. I am for the Established Church, d—mme! Not that I have any more regard for the Established Church than for any other church, but because it is established. And if you can get your d—d religion established, I'll be for that too!" Rees told this story with great glee.

Dr. Abraham Rees.

Lord Thurlow and the Established Church.

The Aikins.

April 12th.—A call on the Aikins. The whole family full of their praises of Charles Lamb. The Doctor termed him a brilliant writer. The union of so much eloquence with so much wit shows great powers of mind. Miss Aikin was not less warm in her praise. She asked why he did not write more. I mentioned, as one cause, the bad character given him by the reviewers. She exclaimed against the reviewers. I then spoke of the Annual Review (Arthur Aikin, the editor, was present), as having hurt him much by its notice of "John Woodvil."† She exclaimed, "Oh! that Tommy; that such a fellow should criticise such a man as Lamb."

* Afterwards Sir Henry Holland, the Court Physician.

† Lamb's Works, 1855, vol. iv., p. 299.

I then mentioned that some persons had attributed the article to Mrs. Barbauld. I was impressed with the sincerity and liberality of the Aikins, in acknowledging a merit so unlike their own. They evinced a universality of taste which I had not supposed them to possess.

Mr. Anderson.

April 13th.—Met a Mr. Anderson, a north-country divine, a hard-headed, shrewd man, of blunt manners, who ought to have been chaplain to the Parliamentary army at the commencement of the civil wars in the time of Charles I. He is a laudator temporis præsentis, rather than acti. He laughed heartily at old Jameson's advertisement, that persons taking apartments in his house "might be accommodated with family prayer."

April 20th.—Called on the Godwins.* They very much admire Miss Flaxman's designs for "Robin Goodfellow;" but do not think they would sell. Parents are now so set against all stories of ghosts, that fifty copies of such designs would not be sold in a year.

Mrs. Siddons as Mrs. Beverley.

April 21st.—Accompanied Cargill† to Covent Garden. Mrs. Siddons in Mrs. Beverley. Her voice appeared to have lost its brilliancy (like a beautiful face through a veil); in other respects, however, her acting is as good as ever. Her "Oh, that my eyes were basilisks!" was her great moment in the play. Her smile was enchantingly beautiful; and her transitions of countenance

* Godwin was at this time largely engaged in publishing books for children. He published Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare," and Miss Lamb's "Mrs. Leicester's School."

† A native of Jamaica, and a pupil of Thelwall. He studied the Law under Serjeant Rough, by H. C. R.'s advice; but afterwards became a clergyman.

Chap. xv. — 1812.

had all the ease and freedom of youth. If she persist in not playing Mrs. Beverley again, that character will, I am confident, never be played with anything like equal attractions. And without some great attraction in the performers, such a play ought not to be represented. It is a dull sermon; the interest kept up by commonplace incidents, and persons who are absolutely no characters at all. Young did not look the part of Beverley well. As Amyot says, he is a bad waistcoat-and-breeches actor.

Indian legend.

April 27th.—At Hazlitt's last lecture. Very well delivered, and full of shrewd observation. At the close, he remarked on the utility of metaphysics. He quoted and half-assented to Hume's sceptical remark, that perhaps they are not worth the study, but that there are persons who can find no better mode of amusing themselves. He then related an Indian legend of a Brahmin, who was so devoted to abstract meditation, that in the pursuit of philosophy he quite forgot his moral duties, and neglected ablution. For this he was degraded from the rank of humanity, and transformed into a monkey. But, even when a monkey, he retained his original propensities, for he kept apart from other monkeys, and had no other delight than that of eating cocoanuts and studying metaphysics. "I, too," said Hazlitt, "should be very well contented to pass my life like this monkey, did I but know how to provide myself with a substitute for cocoanuts."

Coleridge on Kant.

May 3rd.—Left a card at Sir George Beaumont's for Wordsworth. On my return a call on Coleridge. He said that from Fichte and Schelling he has not gained any one great idea. To Kant his obligations are infinite, not so much from what Kant has taught him in the form of doctrine, as from the discipline gained in studying the great German philosopher. Coleridge is indignant at the low estimation in which the post-Kantianers affect to hold their master.

Turner.

*Rem.—May 5th.—This day I saw at the exhibition a picture by Turner, the impression of which still remains. It seemed to me the most marvellous landscape I had ever seen,—Hannibal crossing the Alps in a storm. I can never forget it.†

Johnson, the bookseller, and Cowper's Task.

May 6th.—R. says Johnson, the bookseller, made at least £10,000 by Cowper's poems. The circumstances show the hazard of bookselling speculations. Cowper's first volume of poems was published by Johnson, and fell dead from the press. Author and publisher were to incur equal loss. Cowper begged Johnson to forgive him his debt, and this was done. In return, Cowper sent Johnson his "Task," saying, "You behaved generously to me on a former occasion; if you think it safe to publish this new work, I make you a present of it." Johnson published it. It became popular. The former volume was then sold with it. When Cowper's friends proposed his translating "Homer," Johnson said, "I owe Cowper much for his last book, and will therefore assist in the publication of 'Homer' without any compensation. The work shall be published by subscription. I will take all the trouble and risk, and Cowper shall have all the profit." Johnson soon had occasion to inform the poet that a thousand pounds were at his disposal.

* Written in 1849.

† The picture is now in the National Gallery, Turner Collection. It was No. 258 of the Somerset House Catalogue, and entitled "Snow Storm: Hannibal and his Army crossing the Alps.—J. M. W. TURNER, R.A."

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Wordsworth on his own Poems.

May 8th.—A visit from Wordsworth, who stayed with me from between twelve and one till past three. I then walked with him to Newman Street. His conversation was long and interesting. He spoke of his own poems with the just feeling of confidence which a sense of his own excellence gives him. He is now convinced that he never can derive emolument from them; but, being independent, he willingly gives up all idea of doing so. He is persuaded that if men are to become better and wiser, the poems will sooner or later make their way. But if we are to perish, and society is not to advance in civilization, "it would be," said he, "wretched selfishness to deplore the want of any personal reputation." The approbation he has met with from some superior persons compensates for the loss of popularity, though no man has completely understood him, not excepting Coleridge, who is not happy enough to enter into his feelings. "I am myself," said Wordsworth, "one of the happiest of men; and no man who does not partake of that happiness, who lives a life of constant bustle, and whose felicity depends on the opinions of others, can possibly comprehend the best of my poems." I urged an excuse for those who can really enjoy the better pieces, and who yet are offended by a language they have by early instruction been taught to consider unpoetical; and Wordsworth seemed to tolerate this class, and to allow that his admirers should undergo a sort of education to his works.

May 11th.—Called at Coleridge's, where I found the Lambs. I had just heard of the assassination of Mr. Perceval, which had taken place about an hour and a half before. The news shocked Coleridge exceedingly, and he was at once ready to connect the murder with political fanaticism, Burdett's speeches, &c. Charles Lamb was apparently affected, but could not help mingling humour with his real concern at the event.*

CHAP. XV.

1812.

Assassination of Mr. Perceval.

Spent the evening at Miss Benger's.† Miss Jane Porter‡ there. Her stately figure and graceful manners made an impression on me. Few ladies have been so gifted with personal attractions, and at the same time been so respectable as authors.

Miss Jane Porter.

May 13th.—Wordsworth accompanied me to Charles Aikin's.§ Mrs. Barbauld, the Aikins, Miss Jane Porter, Montgomery the poet, Roscoe,¶ son of the Liverpool Roscoe, &c. The most agreeable circumstance of the evening was the homage involuntarily paid to the poet. Everybody was anxious to get near him. One lady Wordsworth at Charles Aikin's.

* About this time there was an attack on Charles Lamb in the Quarterly Review, in an article on Weber's edition of "Ford's Works." Lamb was called a "poor maniac." It was this attack which occasioned and justified Lamb's sonnet, "St. Crispin to Mr. Gifford,"—a happy jeu d'esprit. That Charles Lamb had, for ever so short a time, been in confinement was not known to me till the recent disclosure in Talfourd's "Final Memorials."—H. C. R.

† Miss Benger obtained considerable literary celebrity as a writer of historical biographies. She was much esteemed in the circle of friends to which she was introduced on first coming to London. Among those friends were Mrs. Barbauld, Miss Aikin, Mrs. Joanna Baillie, Mrs. Elizabeth Hamilton, Dr. Aikin, and Dr. Gregory.

‡ The authoress of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," and other popular novels.

§ Mr. Charles Aikin was then in practice as a medical man in Broad Street, City.

¶ Probably William Stanley Roscoe.

CHAP. XV.
1812.

Political talk.

was ludicrously fidgetty till she was within hearing. A political dispute rather disturbed us for a time. Wordsworth, speaking of the late assassination, and of Sir Francis Burdett's speech ten days ago, said that probably the murderer heard that speech, and that this, operating on his mind in its diseased and inflamed state, might be the determining motive to his act. This was taken up as a reflection on Sir Francis Burdett, and resented warmly by young Roscoe, who maintained that the speech was a constitutional one, and asked what the starving were to do? "Not murder people," said Wordsworth, "unless they mean to eat their hearts."*

Flaxman.

May 15*th.*—A call on Flaxman in the evening. He spoke of Turner's landscape with great admiration, as the best painting in the Exhibition. He praised parts of Hilton's "Christ Healing the Blind," especially the hands of the principal figures, and the contrasted expression of the one expecting the operation of the miracle, and the one on whom it has already taken place. Miss Flaxman pointed out Allingham's "Grief and Pity," and a landscape, "Sadac Seeking the Waters of Oblivion."

Mrs. Siddons.

May 19*th.*—Went to Covent Garden Theatre. Mrs. Siddons played Queen Catherine to perfection, and Kemble as Wolsey, in the scene of his disgrace, was greatly applauded. I think I never saw Mrs. Siddons's pantomime in higher excellence. The dying scene was

* In a note to Mr. Robinson, dated two days after this visit, Wordsworth says, "I have never been well since I met your city politicians; yet I am content to pay this price for the knowledge of so pleasing a person as Mrs. Charles Aikin, being quite an enthusiast when I find a woman whose countenance and manners are what a woman's ought to be."

represented with such truthfulness, as almost to go beyond the bounds of beautiful imitation, viz. by shifting her pillow with the restlessness of a person in pain, and the suspended breath in moving, which usually denotes suffering. It was, however, a most delightful performance.

Coleridge's first lecture of second series.

In an earlier part of the day heard part of Coleridge's first lecture in Willis's Rooms.* As I was present only about a quarter of an hour, I could not enter much into his subject. I perceived that he was in a digressing mood. He spoke of religion, the spirit of chivalry, the Gothic reverence for the female sex, and a classification of poetry into the ancient and the romantic.

The Greek drama.

May 23rd.—Coleridge's second lecture. A beautiful dissertation on the Greek drama. His analysis of the trilogy of Æschylus, the "Agamemnon," &c., was interesting; and his account of the "Prometheus," and his remarks on the "Antigone," were more connected than when I heard him speak on the same subjects on a former occasion.

Blake.

May 24th.—A very interesting day. At half-past ten joined Wordsworth in Oxford Road; we then got into the fields, and walked to Hampstead. I read to him a number of Blake's poems, with some of which he was pleased. He regarded Blake as having in him the elements of poetry much more than either Byron or Scott. We met Miss Joanna Baillie, and accompanied her home. She is small in figure, and her gait is mean and shuffling, but her manners are those of a well-bred

Miss Joanna Baillie.

* A course on Shakespeare, with introductory matter on poetry, the drama, and the stage.

Chap. xv. — 1812.

woman. She has none of the unpleasant airs too common to literary ladies. Her conversation is sensible. She possesses apparently considerable information, is prompt without being forward, and has a fixed judgment of her own, without any disposition to force it on others. Wordsworth said of her with warmth, "If I had to present any one to a foreigner as a model of an English gentlewoman, it would be Joanna Baillie."

Eaton in the pillory.

May 26th.—Walked to the Old Bailey to see D. I. Eaton in the pillory.* As I expected, his punishment of shame was his glory. The mob was not numerous, but decidedly friendly to him. His having published Paine's "Age of Reason" was not an intelligible offence to them. I heard such exclamations as the following: "Pillory a man for publishing a book—shame!"—"I wish old Sir Wicary was there, my pockets should not be empty."—"Religious liberty!"—"Liberty of conscience!" Some avowed their willingness to stand in the pillory for a dollar. "This a punishment? this is no disgrace!" As his position changed, and fresh partisans were blessed by a sight of his round, grinning face, shouts of "bravo!" arose from a new quarter. His trial was sold on the spot. The whole affair was an additional proof of the folly of the Ministers, who ought to have known that such an exhibition would be a triumph to the cause they meant to render infamous.

Coleridge.

Heard Coleridge's third lecture. It was wholly on

* Daniel Isaac Eaton, the publisher of free theological works (Paine's "Age of Reason," "Ecce Homo," &c.). He underwent not less than eight prosecutions by Government for his publications. For publishing the third part of the "Age of Reason" he suffered eighteen months' imprisonment. He died in 1814. (D. I. Eaton is not to be confounded with David Eaton, a bookseller, and the friend of Theophilus Lindsey.)

the Greek drama, though he had promised that he would to-day proceed to the modern drama. The lecture itself excellent and very German.

Miss Wesley.

May 27th.—Went to Miss Benger's in the evening, where I found a large party. Had some conversation with Miss Porter. She won upon me greatly. I was introduced to a character—Miss Wesley, a niece of the celebrated John, and daughter of Samuel Wesley. She is said to be a devout and most actively benevolent woman. Eccentric in her habits, but most estimable in all the great points of character. A very lively little body, with a round short person, in a constant fidget of good-nature and harmless vanity. She has written novels, which do not sell; and is reported to have said, when she was introduced to Miss Edgeworth, "We sisters of the quill ought to know each other." She said she had friends of all sects in religion, and was glad she had, as she could not possibly become uncharitable. She had been in Italy, and loved the Italians for their warmth in friendship. Some one remarked, "They are equally warm in their enmities." She replied, "Of course they are." When I said I loved the people of every country I had been in, she said, in a tone which expressed much more than the words, "How glad I am to hear you say so!"

Coleridge's lecture.

May 29th.—Coleridge's fourth lecture. It was on the nature of comedy—about Aristophanes, &c. The mode of treating the subject very German, and of course much too abstract for his audience, which was thin. Scarcely any ladies there. With such powers of original thought and real genius, both philosophical and poetical, as few men in any age have possessed, Coleridge wants certain minor qualities, which would greatly add to his efficiency and influence with the public. Spent the evening at Morgan's. Both Coleridge and Wordsworth there. Coleridge very metaphysical. He adheres to Kant, notwithstanding all Schelling has written, and maintains that from the latter he has gained no new ideas. All Schelling has said, Coleridge has either thought himself, or found in Jacob Boehme.* Wordsworth talked very finely on poetry. He praised Burns for his introduction to "Tam O'Shanter." Burns had given an apology for drunkenness, by bringing together all the circumstances which can serve to render excusable what is in itself disgusting; thus interesting our feelings, and making us tolerant of what would otherwise be not endurable.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Wordsworth on Tam O'Shanter.

Wordsworth praised also the conclusion of "Death and Dr. Hornbook." He compared this with the abrupt prevention of the expected battle between Satan and the archangel in "Paradise Lost;" but the remark did not bring its own evidence with it. I took occasion to apply to Goethe the praise given to Burns for the passage† quoted, and this led to my warm praise of the German. Coleridge denied merit to "Torquato Tasso," and talked of the impossibility of being a good poet without being a good man, adducing at the same time

Death and Dr. Hornbook.

* The German Visionary and Theosophist (1575—1624).

† The passage from Burns's "Vision" which H. C. R. afterwards quoted to Goethe as resembling the Zueignung (dedication) to his own works. "Each poet confesses his infirmities—each is consoled by the muse; the holly-leaf of the Scotch poet being the 'veil of dew and sunbeams' of the German."

the immoral tendency of Goethe's works. To this I demurred.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Wordsworth on his own poems.

May 31st.—A day of great enjoyment. Walked to Hampstead. Found Wordsworth demonstrating to Hamond some of the points of his philosophical theory. Speaking of his own poems, he said he valued them principally as being a new power in the literary world. Hamond's friend Miller * esteemed them for their pure morality. Wordsworth said he himself looked to the powers of mind they call forth, and the energies they presuppose and excite as the standard by which they should be tried. He expatiated also on his fears lest a social war should arise between the poor and the rich, the danger of which is aggravated by the vast extension of the manufacturing system.†

Wordsworth on politics.

Wordsworth defended earnestly the Church Establishment. He even said he would shed his blood for it. Nor was he disconcerted by a laugh raised against him on account of his having before confessed that he knew not when he had been in a church in his own country. "All our ministers are so vile," said he. The mischief of allowing the clergy to depend on the caprice of the multitude he thought more than outweighed all the evils of an Establishment. And in this I agreed with him.

* A clergyman with whom H. C. R. afterwards became intimate.

† This was a topic which at this time haunted alike Wordsworth and Southey. Now that thirty-six years have elapsed, not only has the danger increased, but the war has actually broken out; and as evidence that men distinctly perceive the fact, in France a word has been applied, not invented, which by implication recognizes the fact. Society is divided into propriétaires and prolétaires. And here we have an incessant controversy carried on by our political economists, as to the respective claims of labour and capital.—H. C. R., 1848.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

Sir Humphry Davy.

Dined with Wordsworth at Mr. Carr's.* Sir Humphry and Lady Davy there. She and Sir H. seem to have hardly finished their honeymoon. Miss Joanna Baillie said to Wordsworth the other day, "We have witnessed a picturesque happiness." Mrs. Walter Scott was spoken of rather disparagingly, and Miss Baillie gave her this good word: "When I visited her I thought I saw a great deal to like. She seemed to admire and look up to her husband. She was very kind to her guests. Her children were well-bred, and the house was in excellent order. And she had some smart roses in her cap, and I did not like her the less for that."

Mrs. Walter Scott.

June 3rd.—Wordsworth told me that, before his ballads were published, Tobin implored him to leave out "We are Seven," as a poem that would damn the book. It became, however, one of the most popular. Wordsworth related this in answer to a remark that, by only leaving out certain poems at the suggestion of some one who knew the public taste, he might avoid giving offence.

We are Seven.

June 5th.—At Covent Garden. For the first time in my life I saw Mrs. Siddons without any pleasure. It was in the part of the Lady in "Comus." She was dressed most unbecomingly, and had a low gipsy hat with feathers hanging down the side. She looked old, and I had almost said ugly. Her fine features were lost in the distance. Even her declamation did not

Mrs. Siddons.

* Carr was Solicitor to the Excise—a clever man, whom I visited occasionally at Hampstead. His eldest daughter married Dr. Lushington. His youngest married Rolfe (Lord Cranworth), after the latter became one of the best of judges.—H. C. R., 1849.

please me. She spoke in too tragic a tone for the situation and character.

Peter Bell.

June 6th.—Lent "Peter Bell" to Charles Lamb. To my surprise, he does not like it. He complains of the slowness of the narrative, as if that were not the art of the poet. He says Wordsworth has great thoughts, but has left them out here. In the perplexity arising from the diverse judgments of those to whom I am accustomed to look up, I have no resource but in the determination to disregard all opinions, and trust to the simple impression made on my own mind. When Lady Mackintosh was once stating to Coleridge her disregard of the beauties of nature, which men commonly affect to admire, he said his friend Wordsworth had described her feeling, and quoted three lines from "Peter Bell:"

> "A primrose by a river's brim
> A yellow primrose was to him,
> And it was nothing more."

"Yes," said Lady Mackintosh, "that is precisely my case."

De Quincey.

June 17th.—At four o'clock dined in the Hall * with De Quincey, who was very civil to me, and cordially invited me to visit his cottage in Cumberland. Like myself, he is an enthusiast for Wordsworth. His person is small, his complexion fair, and his air and manner are those of a sickly and enfeebled man. From this circumstance his sensibility, which I have no doubt is genuine, is in danger of being mistaken for effeminateness. At least coarser and more robustly healthful persons may fall into this mistake.

* That is Middle Temple Hall.

Death of Mrs. Buller.

June 29th.—This evening Mrs. Siddons took her leave of the stage.

*Rem.—About this time, July 2nd, 1812, my Diary refers to the death of Mrs. Buller,†—of those who never in any way came before the public one of the most remarkable women whom I have ever known. She was a lady of family, belonging to the Bullers of Devonshire, and had lived always at court. She said once, incidentally, "The Prince Regent has, I believe, as high a regard for me as for any one—that is none at all. He is incapable of friendship." On politics and on the affairs of life she spoke with singular correctness and propriety. On matters of taste she was altogether antiquated. She was the friend of Mrs. Montague and Mrs. Carter. She showed me in her bookcase some bound quarto volumes, which she assured me consisted of a translation of Plato by herself, in her own hand. She was far advanced in years, and her death did not come upon her unexpectedly. Not many days before she died I called to make inquiries, and the servant, looking in a book and finding my name there, told me I was to be admitted. I found her pale as ashes, bolstered up in an arm-chair. She received me with a smile, and allowed me to touch her hand. "What are you reading, Mr. Robinson?" she said. "The wickedest cleverest book in the English language, if you chance to know it."—"I have known the 'Fable of the Bees'‡ more than fifty years." She was right in her guess.

* Written in 1849. † For Mrs. Buller, see ante, page 318.

‡ The "Fable of the Bees; or, Private Vices Public Benefits." By Bernard Mandeville, 1723. A work of great celebrity, or rather notoriety, in the last century.

Dichtung und Wahrheit.

July 26th.—Finished Goethe's "Aus meinem Leben; Dichtung und Wahrheit." The book has given me great delight. The detailed account of the ceremonies on electing Joseph II. has great interest. Goethe unites the grace and perfect art of the most accomplished writer, with a retention of all the childlike zeal and earnestness which he felt when the impressions were first conveyed to him. I know of no writer who can, like Goethe, blend the feeling of youth with the skill and power of age. Here a perfect masterpiece is produced by the exercise of this rare talent. The account of the election of Joseph derives a pathetic interest from the subsequent destruction of the German Empire. His own innocent boyish amour with Gretchen is related with peculiar grace. The characteristic sketches of the friends of his father are felt by the reader to be portraits of old acquaintances. How familiar the features of the old Hebrew master seem to me, as he encourages the freethinking questions of his pupil about the Jews by laughing, though nothing is to be got by way of answer excepting "'Ei! närrischer Junge?" ("Eh! foolish boy?") The florist, the admirer of Klopstock, the father and grandfather, are all delightfully portrayed. And the remark Wordsworth made on Burns is here also applicable,—"The poet writes humanely." There is not a single character who is hated, certainly not the lying French player-boy, arrant knave though he is. Perhaps Gretchen's kinsfolk are the least agreeable of the minor characters.

Coleridge's early life.

August 4th.—After tea called at Morgan's. The ladies were at home alone. I took a walk with them round the squares. They stated some particulars of Coleridge's family and early life, which were new and interesting to me. His father was a clergyman at Ottery, in Devonshire. Judge Buller, when a young man, lived many years in his family. Indeed he was educated by him. On the death of Mr. Coleridge, Buller went down to offer his services to the widow. She said all her family were provided for, except the tenth, a little boy. Buller promised to provide for him, said he would send him to the Charterhouse, and put him into some profession. Coleridge went to town, and Buller placed him in the Blue-Coat School. The family, being proud, thought themselves disgraced by this. His brothers would not let him visit them in the school dress, and he would not go in any other. The Judge (whether he was judge then I cannot tell) invited him to his house to dine every Sunday. One day, however, there was company, and the blue-coat boy was sent to a second table. He was then only nine years old, but he would never go to the house again. Thus he lost his only friend in London ; and having no one to care for him or show him kindness, he passed away his childhood wretchedly. But he says he was thus led to become a good scholar, for, that he might forget his misery, he had his book always in his hand.

Coleridge and Morgan came back to supper. Coleridge was in good spirits. He is about to turn again to Jean Paul.

August 12th.—Paid a visit to Flaxman in his lodgings at Blackheath, and spent the night there. On the following morning I returned with him to town and accompanied him to Burlington House to see Lord Elgin's Marbles. The new cargo was not yet unpacked. I have neither the learning nor the taste of an artist, but it was interesting even to me to behold fragments of architectural ornaments from cities celebrated by Homer. Flaxman affirmed with confidence that some of the fragments before us were in existence before Homer's time. A stranger came in, whom I afterwards understood to be Chantrey. Flaxman said to him, laying his hand on a piece of stone, "The hand of Phidias was on that!" The stranger remarked that there was one leg which could not have been by Phidias. The stranger conjectured that some ornaments on a sarcophagus were meant to represent the lotus. Two sorts of lotus and the egg, he said, were three of the most sacred objects of antiquity, and were found carved on urns. The lotus, he thought, was the origin of the cornucopia.

Elgin Marbles.

Chantrey.

Coleridge on Faust.

At six I went by appointment to Coleridge, with whom I spent several hours alone, and most agreeably. I read to him a number of scenes out of the new "Faust." He had before read the earlier edition. He now acknowledged the genius of Goethe as he has never before acknowledged it. At the same time, the want of religion and enthusiasm in Goethe, is in Coleridge's estimation an irreparable defect. The beginning of "Faust" did not please Coleridge. Nor does he think Mephistopheles a character. He had, however, nothing satisfactory to oppose to my remark that Mephistopheles ought to be a mere abstraction, and no character. I read to Coleridge the Zueignung, and he seemed to admire it greatly. He had been reading Stolberg lately, of whom he seems to have a sufficiently high opinion. He considers Goethe's "Mahomets Gesang" an imitation of Stolberg's "Felsenstrom;" but the "Felsenstrom" is simply a piece of animated description, without any higher import, while Goethe's poem is a profound and significant allegory, exhibiting the nature of religious enthusiasm. The prologue in heaven to "Faust" did not offend Coleridge as I thought it would, from its being a parody on Job. Coleridge said of Job, this incomparable poem has been most absurdly interpreted. Far from being the most patient of men, Job was the most impatient. And he was rewarded for his impatience. His integrity and sincerity had their recompense because he was superior to the hypocrisy of his friends. Coleridge praised "Wallenstein," but censured Schiller for a sort of ventriloquism in poetry. By-the-by, a happy term to express that common fault of throwing the sentiments and feelings of the writer into the bodies of other persons, the characters of the poem.

Chap. xv. — 1812.

Schiller.

Faust.

August 20th.—More talk with Coleridge about "Faust." The additions in the last edition he thinks the finest parts. He objects that the character of Faust is not motivirt. He would have it explained how he is thrown into a state of mind which led to the catastrophe. The last stage of the process is given. Faust is wretched. He has reached the utmost that finite powers can attain, and he yearns for infinity. Rather than be finitely good, he would be infinitely miserable. This is indeed reducing the wisdom and genius of Goethe's incomparable poem to a dull, commonplace, moral idea; but I do not give it as the thing, only the abstract form. All final results and most general abstractions are, when thus reduced, seemingly trite. Coleridge talks of writing a new Faust! He would never get out of vague conceptions—he would lose himself in dreams! In the spirited sketch he gave of Goethe's work, I admired his power of giving interest to a prose statement.

Dr. Parr.

September 6th.—A delightful walk with my friend Amyot.* He told some anecdotes of Dr. Parr, whom he knew. The Doctor was asked his opinion on some subject of politics; with an affectation of mystery and importance he replied, "I am not fond of speaking on the subject. If I were in my place in the House of Lords, I should, &c. &c."

A walk.

13*th.*—A delightful day. The pleasantest walk by far I have had this summer. The very rising from one's bed at Hamond's house is an enjoyment worth going to Hampstead overnight to partake of. The morning scene from his back-room is exceedingly beautiful. We breakfasted at seven. He and his sisters accompanied me beyond The Spaniards, and down some fields opposite Kenwood. The wet grass sent them back, and I went on (rather out of my way) till I entered the Barnet road just before the west end of Finchley Common. I crossed the common obliquely, and, missing the shortest way, came to a good turnpike road at Colney Hatch. On the heath I was amused by the novel sight of gipsies. The road from Colney Hatch to Southgate very pleasing indeed. Southgate a delightful village. No distant prospect from the green, but there are fine trees admirably grouped, and neat and happy houses scattered in picturesque corners and lanes. The great houses, Duchess of Chandos', &c., have, I suppose, a distant view. I then followed a path to Winchmore Hill, and another to Enfield: the last through some of the richest verdure I ever saw. The hills exquisitely undulating. Very fine clumps of oak-trees. Enfield town, the large white church, the serpentine New River, Mr. Mellish's house, with its woody appendages, form a singularly beautiful picture. I reached Enfield at about half-past ten, and found Anthony Robinson happy with his family. As usual, I had a very pleasant day with him. Our chat interesting and uninterrupted. Before dinner we lounged round the green, and saw the Cedar of Lebanon which once belonged to Queen Elizabeth's palace, of which only a chimney now remains. A little after five I set out on my walk homeward, through Hornsey and Islington. Till I came to Hornsey Church, where I was no longer able to see, I was occupied during my walk in reading Schlegel's "Vorlesungen;" his account of Æschylus and Sophocles, and their plays, very excellent. I was especially interested in his account of the Trilogy. How glad I should be to have leisure to translate such a work as this of Schlegel's! I reached my chambers about nine. Rather fatigued, though my walk was not a long one—only eighteen or twenty miles.

* See p. 25.

CHAP. XV. — 1812.

A walk to Enfield.

September 19th.—After an early dinner walked to Blackheath, reading a very amusing article in the Edinburgh Review about ants. I cannot, however, enter into the high enjoyment which some persons have in such subjects. What, after all, is there that is delightful or soul-elevating in contemplating countless myriads of animals, endowed with marvellous powers, which lead to nothing beyond the preservation of individual existence, or rather the preservation of a race? The effect is rather sad than animating; for the more wonderful their powers are, the more elaborately complex and more curiously fitted to their end, and the more they resemble those of human beings, the less apparent absurdity is there in the supposition that our powers should cease with their present manifestation. For my part, I am convinced that the truths and postulates of religion have their sole origin and confirmation in conscience and the moral sense.

Edinburgh Review, article on ants.

Miss Edgeworth.

September 21st.—Took tea at C. Aikin's. A chat about Miss Edgeworth. Mrs. Aikin willing to find in her every excellence, whilst I disputed her power of interesting in a long connected tale, and her possession of poetical imagination. In her numerous works she has certainly conceived and executed a number of forms, which, though not representatives of ideas, are excellent characters. Her sketches and her conceptions of ordinary life are full of good sense; but the tendency of her writings to check enthusiasm of every kind is of very problematical value.

Spinoza.

Oct. 3rd.—Coleridge walked with me to A. Robinson's for my Spinoza, which I lent him. While standing in the room he kissed Spinoza's face in the title-page, and said, "This book is a gospel to me."* But in less than a

* Mr. H. C. Robinson's copy of the works of Spinoza is now in the library of Manchester New College, London, with marginalia from the hand of Coleridge. They are limited to the first part of the Ethica, "De Deo;" and to minute he added, "his philosophy is nevertheless false Spinoza's system has been demonstrated to be false, bu only by that philosophy which has demonstrated th falsehood of all other philosophies. Did philosoph commence with an it is, instead of an I am, Spinoz would be altogether true." And without allowing some letters in his correspondence, especially with Oldenburg, one of th earliest secretaries of the Royal Society in London. It appears from thes marginal notes, that Coleridge heartily embraced Spinoza's fundamental posi tion of the Divine Immanence in all things, as distinguished from the ordinar anthropomorphic conceptions of God, but was anxious to guard it from the pan theistic conclusions which might be supposed to result from it, and to clear i from the necessarian and materialistic assumptions with which he thought Spi noza himself had gratuitously encumbered it. Everywhere Coleridge distinctl asserts the Divine Intelligence and the Divine Will against the vague, negativ generality in which Spinoza's overpowering sense of the incommensurability o the Divine and the Human had left them; and strenuously contends for the free dom of human actions as the indispensable basis of a true theory of morals "It is most necessary," he says, in a note on Propos. xxviii. (of the first part o the Ethics), "to distinguish Spinozism from Spinoza—i.e. the necessary conse quences of the immanence in God as the one only necessary Being whose essenc involves existence, with the deductions—from Spinoza's own mechanic realisti view of the world." "Even in the latter," he continues, "I cannot accord wit Jacobi's assertion, that Spinozism as taught by Spinoza is atheism; for though h will not consent to call things essentially disparate by the same name, and therefor denies human intelligence to Deity, yet he adores his Wisdom, and expressl declares the identity of Love, i.e. perfect virtue or concentric will in the huma being, and that with which the Supreme loves himself, as all in all." "Never,' he concludes, "has a great man been so hardly and inequitably treated by pos terity as Spinoza: no allowances made for the prevalence, nay universality, o dogmatism and the mechanic system in his age; no trial, except in Germany to adopt the glorious truths into the family of Life and Power. What if w treated Bacon with the same harshness!"

CHAP. XV.
—
1812.

One other note on the same subject (appended to Epist. xxxvi.) is so charac teristic, and in so beautiful a spirit, that it ought to be transcribed:—

"The truth is, Spinoza, in common with all the metaphysicians before him (Böhme perhaps excepted), began at the wrong end, commencing with God a an object. Had he, though still dogmatizing objectively, begun with the natura naturans in its simplest terms, he must have proceeded on 'per intelligen tiam' to the subjective, and having reached the other pole = idealism, or the 'I,' he would have reprogressed to the equatorial point, or the identity of subject breathing time, Coleridge parenthetically asserted, "I, however, believe in all the doctrines of Christianity, even the Trinity." A. Robinson afterwards observed, "Coleridge has a comprehensive faith and love." Contrary to my expectation, however, he was pleased with these outbursts, rather than offended by them. They impressed him with the poet's sincerity. Coleridge informs me that his tragedy is accepted at Drury Lane. Whitbread * admires it exceedingly, and Arnold, the manager, is confident of its success. Coleridge says he is now about to compose lectures, which are to be the produce of all his talent and power, on education. Each lecture is to be delivered in a state in which it may be sent to the press.

James and Horace Smith.

October 10th.—Dined at the Hall. A chatty party. It is said that Lady ——— invited H. Twiss to dinner, and requested him to introduce an amusing friend or two. He thought of the authors of the "Rejected Addresses," and invited James Smith and his brother to come in the evening of a day on which he himself was to dine with her ladyship. Smith wrote, in and object; and would thus have arrived finally not only at the clear idea of God, as absolute Being, the ground of all existents (for so far he did reach, and to charge him with atheism is a gross calumny), but likewise at the faith in the living God, who hath the ground of his own existence in himself. That this would have been the result, had he lived a few years longer, I think his Epist. lxxii. authorizes us to believe; and of so pure a soul, so righteous a spirit as Spinoza, I dare not doubt that this potential fact is received by the Eternal as actual."

In the epistle here referred to, Spinoza expresses his intention, should his life be spared, of defining more clearly his ideas concerning "the eternal and infinite Essence in relation to extension," which he thought Des Cartes had wrongly taken as the definition of Matter. J. J. T.

* Mr. S. Whitbread, M.P., was a propietor of shares in Drury Lane Theatre, and through friendship for Sheridan took an active part in its affairs.

answer, that he was flattered by the polite invitation, but it happened unluckily that both he and his brother had a prior engagement at Bartholomew Fair—he to eat fire and his brother to swallow 200 yards of ribbon.

Huntington.

October 22nd.—Heard W. Huntington preach, the man who puts S. S. (sinner saved) after his name.* He has an admirable exterior; his voice is clear and melodious; his manner singularly easy, and even graceful. There was no violence, no bluster, yet there was no want of earnestness or strength. His language was very figurative, the images being taken from the ordinary business of life, and especially from the army and navy. He is very colloquial, and has a wonderful Biblical memory; indeed, he is said to know the whole Bible by heart. I noticed that, though he was frequent in his citations, and always added chapter and verse, he never opened the little book he had in his hand. He is said to resemble Robert Robinson of Cambridge. There was nothing shrewd or original in the sermon to-day, but there was hardly any impropriety. I detected but a single one: Huntington said, "Take my word for it, my friends, they who act in this way will not be beloved by God, or by anybody else."

December 15th.—Hamond mentioned that recently, when he was on the Grand Jury, and they visited New-

* He thus explained his adoption of these mysterious letters:—"M.A. is out of my reach for want of learning, D.D. I cannot attain for want of cash, but S.S. I adopt, by which I mean sinner saved." His portrait is in the National Portrait Gallery. He commenced his own epitaph thus: "Here lies the coal heaver, beloved of God, but abhorred of men." He died at Tunbridge Wells in 1813. His published works extend to twenty volumes.

Cobbett.

gate prison, he proposed inquiring of Cobbett whether he had anything to complain of.* Cobbett answered, "Nothing but the being here." Hamond said, the reverent bows his fellow-jurymen made to Cobbett were quite ludicrous.

Family religion.

December 20th, Sunday.—A large family party at the Bischoff's, of which not the least agreeable circumstance was, that there was a family religious service. There is something most interesting and amiable in family devotional exercise, when, as in this instance, there is nothing austere or ostentatious. Indeed everything almost that is done by a family, as such, is good. Religion assumes a forbidding aspect only when it is mingled with impure feelings, as party animosity, malignant intolerance, and contempt.

Liston and Mathews.

Dec. 23rd.—Saw "Bombastes Furioso" and "Midas." In both Liston was less funny than usual. Is it that he has grown fatter? Droll persons should be very fat or very thin. Mathews is not good as the king in "Bombastes." He is excellent chiefly as a mimic, or where rapidity of transition or volubility is required.

Mrs. Barbauld's "1811."

Rem.†—It was in the early part of this year that dear Mrs. Barbauld incurred great reproach by writing a poem entitled "1811." It is in heroic rhyme, and prophesies that on some future day a traveller from the antipodes will, from a broken arch of Blackfriars Bridge, contemplate the ruins of St. Paul's!! This was written more in sorrow than in anger; but there was a dis-

* In 1810 Cobbett was tried for publishing certain observations on the flogging of some militiamen at Ely. He was sentenced to pay a fine of £1,000, or be imprisoned for two years; he chose the latter.

† Written in 1849.

CHAP. XV.
—
1812.

heartening and even gloomy tone, which even I with all my love for her could not quite excuse. It provoked a very coarse review in the Quarterly, which many years afterwards Murray told me he was more ashamed of than any other article in the Review.

Misunderstanding between Wordsworth and Coleridge.

[During this year a misunderstanding arose between Coleridge and Wordsworth, to which, as "all's well that ends well," it is not improper to allude. The cause of the misunderstanding was the repetition to Coleridge, with exaggerations, of what, with a kindly intent, had been said respecting him by Wordsworth to a third person. C. Lamb thought a breach would inevitably take place, but Mr. Robinson determined to do all he could to prevent such a misfortune. Accordingly he set about the work of mediation, and he certainly did his part most thoroughly. Going repeatedly from one friend to the other, he was able to offer such explanations and to give such assurances that the ground of complaint was entirely removed, and the old cordiality was restored between two friends who, as he knew, loved and honoured each other sincerely. In these interviews he was struck alike with the feeling and eloquence of the one, and the integrity, purity, and delicacy shown by the other. On the 11th of May he went to Coleridge's, and found Lamb with him. The assassination of Mr. Perceval had just taken place.* The news deeply affected them, and they could hardly talk of anything else; but the Diary has this entry: "Coleridge said to me, in a half-whisper, that Wordsworth's letter had been perfectly satisfactory, and that he had answered it immediately. I flatter myself, therefore, that my pains will not have been lost, and that through the interchange of statement, which but for me would probably never have been made, a reconciliation will have taken place most desirable and salutary."*—ED.]

* See p. 377.

* The Diary contains many details on this subject; but it has not been thought necessary to give them a place in these selections.

CHAP. XVI.
—
1813.

CHAPTER XVI.

1813.

Coleridge's Remorse.

January 23rd.—In the evening at Drury Lane, to see the first performance of Coleridge's tragedy, "Remorse."* I sat with Amyot, the Hamonds, Godwins, &c. My interest for the play was greater than in the play, and my anxiety for its success took from me the feeling of a mere spectator. I have no hesitation in saying that its poetical is far greater than its dramatic merit, that it owes its success rather to its faults than to its beauties, and that it will have for its less meritorious qualities applause which is really due to its excellences. Coleridge's great fault is that he indulges before the public in those metaphysical and philosophical speculations which are becoming only in solitude or with select minds. His two principal characters are philosophers of Coleridge's own school; the one a sentimental moralist, the other a sophisticated villain—both are dreamers. Two experiments made by Alvez on his return, the one on his mistress by relating a dream, and the other when he tries to kindle remorse

* Coleridge had complained to me of the way in which Sheridan spoke in company of his tragedy. He told me that Sheridan had said that in the original copy there was in the famous cave scene this line,—

"Drip! Drip! Drip! There's nothing here but dripping."

However, there was every disposition to do justice to it on the stage, nor were the public unfavourably disposed towards it.

in the breast of Ordonio, are too fine-spun to be intelligible. However, in spite of these faults, of the improbability of the action, of the clumsy contrivance with the picture, and the too ornate and poetic diction throughout, the tragedy was received with great and almost unmixed applause, and was announced for repetition without any opposition.

Coleridge's last lecture.

January 26th.—Heard Coleridge's concluding lecture. He was received with three rounds of applause on entering the room, and very loudly applauded during the lecture and at its close. That Coleridge should ever become a popular man would at one time have been thought a very vain hope. It depends on himself; and if he would make a sacrifice of some peculiarities of taste (his enemies assert that he has made many on essential points of religion and politics), he has talents to command success. His political opinions will suit a large portion of the public; and, though not yet a favourite with the million, the appreciation of his genius is spreading.

Coleridge on Goethe.

February 2nd.—I went with Aders to see Coleridge, who spoke to my German friend of Goethe with more warmth than usual. He said that if he seemed to depreciate Goethe it was because he compared him with the greatest of poets. He thought Goethe had, from a sort of caprice, underrated the talent which in his youth he had so eminently displayed in his "Werter"—that of exhibiting man in a state of exalted sensibility. In after life he delighted in representing objects of pure beauty, not objects of desire and passion—rather as statues or paintings—

Chap. xvi. — 1813.

therefore he called Goethe picturesque. Coleridge accused Schlegel of one-sidedness in his excessive admiration of Shakespeare.

Examination.

February 23rd.—I underwent a sort of examination from Mr. Hollist, the Treasurer of the Middle Temple. He inquired at what University I had been educated, and this caused me to state that I was a Dissenter, and had studied at Jena. This form being ended, all impediments to my being called to the Bar next term are cleared away.

Talfourd.

This day a Mr. Talfourd called with a letter from Mr. Rutt; he is going to study the law, and wants information from me concerning economical arrangements; he has been for some time Dr. Valpy's head boy, and wishes, for a few years, to occupy himself by giving instruction or otherwise, so as to be no incumbrance to his father, who has a large family. He is a very promising young man indeed, has great powers of conversation and public speaking, not without the faults of his age, but with so much apparent vigour of mind, that I am greatly mistaken if he do not become a distinguished man.

February 24th.—Attended a conference in the vestry of the Gravel Pit Meeting, Mr. Aspland presiding. The subject was "Infant Baptism." Young Talfourd spoke in a very spirited manner, but in too oratorical a tone.* We walked from Hackney together; his youthful animation and eagerness excited my envy. It fell from him accidentally, that a volume of poems, written by him when at school, had been printed, but that he was ashamed of them.

* In his early life Mr. Talfourd was a Dissenter, and occasionally took part in the conferences held in the vestry at the Gravel Pit Meeting, Hackney, to discuss religious subjects.

Talfourd.

*Rem.—Talfourd combined great industry with great vivacity of intellect. He had a marvellous flow of florid language both in conversation and speech-making. His father being unable to maintain him in his profession, he had to support himself, which he did most honourably. He went into the chambers of Chitty, the great special pleader, as a pupil ; but he submitted, for a consideration, to drudgery which would be thought hardly compatible with such lively faculties, and at variance with his dramatic and poetic taste. These, too, he made to a certain extent matters of business. He connected himself with magazines, and became the theatrical critic for several of them. He thereby contracted a style of flashy writing, which offended severe judges, who drew in consequence unfavourable conclusions which have not been realized. He wrote pamphlets, which were printed in the Pamphleteer, published by his friend Valpy. Among these was a very vehement eulogy of Wordsworth. He became intimate with Lamb, who introduced him to Wordsworth. It was in these words: "Mr. Wordsworth, I introduce to you Mr. Talfourd, my only admirer." That he became in after life the executor of Lamb and his biographer is well known. Among his early intimacies was that with the family of Mr. Rutt, to whose eldest daughter, Rachel, he became attached. After a time Talfourd came to me with the request that I would procure for him

* Written in 1847.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813.

employment as a reporter for the Times, that he might be enabled to marry. This I did, and no one could fill the office more honourably, as was acknowledged by his associates on the Oxford Circuit. He made known at once at the Bar mess what he was invited to do. Others had done the same thing on other circuits secretly and most dishonourably. Consent was given by the Bar of his circuit; and in this way, as a writer for papers and magazines, and by his regular professional emoluments, he honourably brought up a numerous family. As his practice increased he gradually gave up writing for the critical press, and also his office of reporting. But when he renounced literature for emolument, he carried it on for fame, and became a dramatic writer. His first tragedy, "Ion," earned general applause, and in defiance of the advice of prudent or timid friends he produced two other tragedies.* He did not acquire equal reputation for these; probably a fortunate circumstance, as literary fame is no recommendation either to an Attorney or to a Minister who seeks for a laborious Solicitor-General. It was after he was known as a dramatist that Talfourd † obtained a seat in Parliament, where he distinguished himself by introducing a bill in favour of a copyright for authors, to which he was urged mainly by Wordsworth, who had become his friend.

* "Ion" was produced at Covent Garden Theatre in May, 1836. The principal character, first performed by Macready, was afterwards undertaken by Miss Ellen Tree. Talfourd's second tragedy, "The Athenian Captive," in which Macready played Thoas, was produced at the Haymarket, 1838. The third and least successful was "Glencoe," first represented at the Haymarket, May 23rd, 1840. Macready again played the hero.—G. S.

† Talfourd was Member for Reading, where he had been a pupil at the Grammar School, under Dr. Valpy.

His bill, however, did not pass, and the work was taken out of his hands. The Act* which at length passed the legislature did not grant as much as Talfourd asked for. The one Act which ought to be known by his name, was one conferring on unhappy wives, separated from their husbands, a right to have a sight of their children.

Talfourd soon acquired popularity at the Bar, from the mere faculty of speaking, as many have done who were after all not qualified for heavy work. I might have doubted of the Serjeant's qualifications in this respect, but some years ago I heard the late Lord Chief Justice Tindal praise him highly for judgment and skill in the management of business. He said he was altogether a successful advocate. No man got more verdicts, and no man more deserved to get them. Talfourd is a generous and kind-hearted man. To men of letters and artists in distress, such as Leigh Hunt, Haydon, &c., he was always very liberal. He did not forget his early friends, and at the large parties he has hitherto delighted to give, poets, players, authors of every kind, were to be seen, together with barristers, and now and then judges.

Sir John Soane.

Feb. 26th, 1813.—Went to the Royal Academy and heard Sir John Soane deliver his third lecture on Architecture; it was not very interesting, but the conclusion was diverting. "As the grammarian has his positive, comparative, and superlative, and as we say, 'My King, my Country, and my God,' so ought the lover of fine art to say, Painting, Sculpture, Architecture"!!!

* This is always, however, spoken of as Talfourd's Act.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813. Mathews. Mrs. Jordan.

March 18th.—Went to Covent Garden. Saw "Love for Love."* Mathews, by admirable acting, gave to Foresight a significance and truth strikingly contrasted with the unmeaning insipidity of most of the other characters. Mrs. Jordan played Miss Prue, and certainly with great spirit. She looked well, but her voice has lost much of its sweetness and melody; yet she is still the most fascinating creature on the stage. She also took the part of Nell in "The Devil to Pay;" in this her acting was truly admirable. Her age and bulk do not interfere with any requisite in the character.

Croly.

April 5th.—With Walter, who introduced me to Croly, his dramatic critic, who is about to go to Hamburg to discharge the duty I performed six years before. Croly is a fierce-looking Irishman, very lively in conversation, and certainly has considerable talent as a writer; his eloquence, like his person, is rather energetic than elegant, and though he has great power and concentration of thought, he wants the delicacy and discrimination of judgment which are the finest qualities in a critic.†

Wellesley.

April 9th.—Accompanied Andrews‡ to the House

* Congreve's animated comedy of "Love for Love" was produced under Betterton at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1695. The part of Ben was written for Doggett. Mrs. Abington was celebrated for her performance of Miss Prue, and the excellence of the play was especially manifest when performed by a powerful company under Mr. Macready's management at Drury Lane Theatre, in 1843.—G. S.

† Croly's career has been a singular one. He tried his hand as a contributor to the daily press in various ways. He wrote tragedies, comedies, and novels—at least one of each; and at last settled down as a preacher, with the rank of Doctor, but of what faculty I do not know.—H. C. R., 1847.

‡ Afterwards Serjeant Andrews.

of Lords, to hear Lord Wellesley's speech on East Indian affairs. I was very much disappointed, for I discerned in the speech (evidently a prepared and elaborate one) not one of the great qualities of an orator or statesman. His person is small, and his animation has in it nothing of dignity and weighty energy. He put himself into a sort of artificial passion, and was in a state of cold inflammation. He began with a parade of first principles, and made a fuss about general ideas, which were, I thought, after all very commonplace. Yet the speech had excited curiosity, and brought a great number of members of the House of Commons behind the Throne. But after listening for an hour and a half my patience was exhausted, and I came home.

John Buck.

April 15*th.—A useful morning at the King's Bench, Guildhall. My friend John Buck was examined as a witness in a special jury insurance cause. Garrow rose to cross-examine him. "You have been many years at Lloyd's, Mr. Buck?"—"Seventeen years." Garrow sat down, but cross-examined at great length another witness. Lord Ellenborough, in his summing up, said, "You will have remarked that Mr. Attorney did not think it advisable to ask Mr. Buck a single question. Now on that gentleman's testimony everything turns, for if you think that his statement is correct——" before he could complete the sentence the foreman said, "For the Plaintiff, my Lord."—"I thought as much," said the Chief Justice.

H. C. R.'s call to the Bar.

May 8*th.*—In the evening went to the Temple, where

* See page 30.

Chap. xvi. — 1813.

I learned that I had been called to the Bar. The assurance of the fact, though I had no reason to doubt it, gave me pleasure.

*Rem.—I have frequently asserted, since my retirement, that the two wisest acts of my life were my going to the Bar when, according to the usual age at which men begin practice, I was already an old man, being thirty-eight, and my retiring from the Bar when, according to the same ordinary usage, I was still a young man, viz. fifty-three.

H. C. R. to T. R.

56 Hatton Garden,
May 9, 1813.

My dear Thomas,

Letter from H. C. R. to T. R.

. . . . Before I notice the more interesting subject of your letter, I will dismiss the history of yesterday in a few words, just to satisfy your curiosity. At four o'clock precisely I entered the Middle Temple Hall in pontificalibus, where the oaths of allegiance and abjuration were administered to me. I then dined, dressed as I was, at a table apart. I had five friends with me. After dinner we ascended the elevation at the end of the Hall. My friends and acquaintance gradually joined our party. We were just a score in number. I believe you are acquainted with none of them but the Colliers, Amyot, Andrews, and Quayle. The rest were professional men. After drinking about six bottles of humble port, claret was brought in, and we broke up at ten. What we had been doing in the meanwhile I shall be better able to tell when I have received the butler's bill. I cannot say that it was a day of much enjoyment to me. I am told, and indeed I felt, that I was quite nervous when I took the oaths. And I had moments of very serious reflection even while the bottle was circulating, and I was affecting the boon companion. One incident, however, did serve to raise my spirits. On my coming home, just before dinner, I found with your letter the copy of an Act of Parliament which Wedd Nash had left. He had nominated me Auditor in a private Inclosure Act, and the fee, he informed Mrs. Collier, would be ten guineas. The timing of this my first professional emolument does credit to Nash's friendliness and delicacy.

* Written in 1847.

* * * * * *

The Edgeworths.

June 13th.—Went to Mrs. Barbauld's. Had a pleasant chat with her about Madame de Staël, the Edgeworths, &c. The latter are staying in London, and the daughter gains the good-will of every one ; not so the father. They dined at Sotheby's. After dinner Mr. Edgeworth was sitting next Mrs. Siddons, Sam Rogers being on the other side of her. "Madam," said he, "I think I saw you perform Millamont thirty-five years ago."—"Pardon me, sir."—"Oh, then it was forty years ago ; I distinctly recollect it."—"You will excuse me, sir, I never played Millamont."—"Oh, yes, ma'am, I recollect."—"I think," she said, turning to Mr. Rogers, "it is time for me to change my place ;" and she rose with her own peculiar dignity.*

* This anecdote is given with a difference in the Reminiscences and the Diary. In the latter, the dinner-party is said to have been at Lord Lonsdale's, and the person to whom Mrs. Siddons turned on leaving her seat, Tom Moore.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813.

Madame de Staël.

June 24th.—A Dies non, and therefore a holiday. Called on Madame de Staël at Brunet's. She received me very civilly, and I promise myself much pleasure from her society during the year she intends remaining in England. I intimated to her that I was become a man of business, and she will be satisfied with my attending her evening parties after nine o'clock. Her son is a very genteel young man, almost handsome, but with something of a sleepy air in his eye, and the tone of his conversation a whisper which may be courtly, but gives an appearance of apathy. The daughter I scarcely saw, but she seems to be plain.

Lord Lyndhurst.

July 6th.—Went to a supper-party at Rough's, given in honour of the new Serjeant, Copley. Burrell, the Pordens, Flaxmans, Tooke, &c., there.

*Rem.—This was the first step in that career of success which distinguished the ex-chancellor, now called the venerable Lord Lyndhurst.

Madame de Staël.

July 11th.—Called this morning on Madame de Staël at 3, George Street, Hanover Square. It is singular that, having in Germany assisted her as a student of philosophy, I should now render her service as a lawyer. Murray the bookseller was with her, and I assisted in drawing up the agreement for her forthcoming work on Germany, for which she is to receive 1,500 guineas.

Leaves the Colliers.

July 14th.—Going into the country for the summer, I quitted the house and family of the Colliers, in which I had lived as an inmate for years with great pleasure. I am to return, though only as a visitor, in the autumn,

* Written in 1847.

after my first experience of law practice on the circuit and at the sessions.

Bar mess.

July 18th.—My first dinner with the Bar mess, at the Angel Inn at Bury, where I took my seat as junior on the Sessions Circuit. Our party consisted of Hunt, Hart, Storks,* Whitbread, and Twiss. I enjoyed the afternoon. Hunt is a gentlemanly man, Hart an excellent companion. Storks was agreeable, and Whitbread has a pleasing countenance.

Hart.

Rem.†—Hart was in every way the most remarkable man of our circuit. He was originally a preacher among the Calvinistic Baptists, among whom he had the reputation of being at the same time so good a preacher and so bad a liver that it was said to him once, "Mr. Hart, when I hear you in the pulpit, I wish you were never out of it; when I see you out of it, I wish you were never in it." He married a lady, the heir in tail after the death of her father, Sir John Thorold, to a large estate.

At the death of Sir John, Hart left his profession. When I saw him a couple of years after, he had taken the name of Thorold; and then he told me that he never knew what were the miseries of poverty until he came into the possession of an entailed estate—all his creditors came upon him at once, and he was involved in perpetual quarrels with his family. His wretchedness led to a complete change in his habits, and he became in his old age again a preacher. He built a chapel on his estate at his own expense, and preached voluntarily to those who partook of his enthusiasm, and could relish popular declamations of ultra-Calvinism.

* Afterwards Serjeant Storks.

† Written in 1847.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813.

Defending a man for murder.

August 20th.—(At Norwich.) I defended a man for the murder of his wife and her sister by poison. It was a case of circumstantial evidence. There was a moral certainty that the man had put corrosive sublimate into a tea-kettle, though no evidence so satisfactory as his Tyburn countenance. I believe the acquittal in this case was owing to this circumstance. The wife, expecting to die, said, "No one but my husband could have done it." As this produced an effect, I cross-examined minutely as to the proximity of other cottages—there being children about—the door being on the latch, &c.; and then concluded with an earnest question—"On your solemn oath, were there not twelve persons at least who could have done it?"—"Yes, there were." And then an assenting nod from a juryman. I went home, not triumphant. But the accident of being the successful defender of a man accused of murder brought me forward, and though my fees at two assize towns did not amount to £50, yet my spirits were raised.

Blosset.

*Rem.—Serjeant Blosset (formerly Peckwell) was, taking him for all in all, the individual whose memory I respect the most of my departed associates on the circuit. He was a quiet unpretending man, with gentlemanly, even graceful manners, and though neither an orator nor a man of eminent learning or remarkable acuteness, yet far beyond every other man on our circuit. He had the skill to advocate a bad cause well, without advocating that which was bad in the cause

* Written in 1847.

Chap. xvi.

1813.

—which greater men than he were sometimes unable o do. Hence he was a universal favourite.

Henry Cooper.

My immediate senior on the circuit was Henry Cooper. He was very far my superior in talent for business—indeed in some respects he was an extraordinary man. His memory, his cleverness, were striking; but so was his want of judgment, and it often happened that his clever and amusing hits told as much against as for his client. One day he was entertaining he whole court, when Rolfe (now the Baron, then almost he junior)* whispered to me, "How clever that is! How thank God I am not so clever!"

I once saw Cooper extort a laugh from Lord Ellenborough in spite of himself. "But it is said ny client got drunk. Why, everybody gets drunk." Then, changing his voice from a shrill tone to a alf-whisper, and with a low bow, he added, "Always xcepting your Lordships and the Bishops."

Dinner at Madame de Staël's.

October 18th.—Dined with Madame de Staël—a party f liberals at her house, viz:—Lady Mackintosh, Robert Adair the diplomatist, Godwin, Curran, and Murray, &c.

Buonaparte.

Our hostess spoke freely of Buonaparte. She was ntroduced to him when a victorious general in Italy; ven then he affected princely airs, and spoke as if it nattered not what he said—he conferred honour by aying anything. He had a pleasure in being rude. He aid to her, after her writings were known, that he did ot think women ought to write books. She answered, "It is not every woman who can gain distinction by an

* Afterwards Lord Chancellor Cranworth.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813.

alliance with a General Buonaparte." Buonaparte said to Madame de Condorcet, the widow of the philosopher, who was a great female politician, and really a woman of talent, "I do not like women who meddle with politics." Madame de Condorcet instantly replied, "Ah, mon Général, as long as you men take a fancy to cut off our heads now and then, we are interested in knowing why you do it."

On one occasion Buonaparte said to a party of ladies, "Faites moi des conscrits."

Our hostess asserted that every political topic could be exhausted in one hour's speech; but, when pressed, it was evident that by exhausting a subject she understood uttering all the possible generalities and commonplaces it involves. She praised Erskine's speeches.

Curran.

Curran, who listened, held his tongue; he said but one thing on the subject of oratory, and that was in praise of Fox, who he said was the most honest and candid of speakers, and spoke only to convince fairly. "It seemed to me," said Curran, "as if he were addressing himself to me personally."

Sheridan.

Adair praised Sheridan highly in the past tense, but said he injured himself by an injudicious imitation of Burke in his speech before the lords on the impeachment of Hastings. Sheridan was praised for his faculty of abstracting his mind from all other things and working up a subject.

Curran.

Curran, who is in his best moments a delightful companion, told some merry stories, at which our hostess exclaimed, "Ah, que cela est charmant!" He was, however, also melancholy, and said he never went to bed in Ireland without wishing not to rise again. He spoke of the other world and those he should wish to see there. Madame de Staël said that after she had seen those she loved (this with a sentimental sigh), she should inquire for Adam and Eve, and ask how they were born. During a light conversation about the living and the dead, Lady Mackintosh exclaimed, "After all, the truth of it seems to be that the sinners have the best of it in this world and the saints in the next." Curran declared "Paradise Lost" to be the worst poem in the language. Milton was incapable of a delicate or tender sentiment towards woman. Curran did not render these heresies palatable by either originality or pleasantry. Godwin defended Milton with zeal, and even for his submission to Cromwell, who, he said, though a usurper, was not a tyrant, nor cruel. This was said in opposition to Madame de Staël, who was not pleased with the philosopher. She said to Lady Mackintosh, after he was gone, "I am glad I have seen this man—it is curious to see how naturally Jacobins become the advocates of tyrants; so it is in France now." Lady Mackintosh apologized for him in a gentle tone; "he had been harshly treated, and almost driven out of society; he was living in retirement." The others spoke kindly of him.

Godwin.

November 1st.—After a short visit to Anthony Robinson, came to chambers and slept for the first time in my own bed. I felt a little uncomfortable at the reflection of my solitude, but also some satisfaction at the thought that I was at least independent and at home. I have not yet collected around me all that even I deem comforts, but I shall find my wants very few, I believe, if I except those arising from the desire to appear respectable, not to say wealthy, in the eyes of the world.

H. C. R. at his chambers.

CHAP. XVI. — 1813.

C. Lamb.

November 12th.—In the evening a party at Anthony Robinson's. The Lambs were there, and Charles seemed to enjoy himself. We played cards, and at the close of the evening he dryly said to Mrs. Robinson, "I have enjoyed the evening much, which I do not often do at people's houses."

Madame de Staël.

November 15th.—Called on Madame de Staël, to whom I had some civil things to say about her book, which she received with less than an author's usual self-complacence; but she manifested no readiness to correct some palpable omissions and mistakes I began pointing out to her. And when I suggested that, in her account of Goethe's "Triumph" (der Empfindsamkeit), she had mistaken the plot, she said, "Perhaps I thought it better as I stated it!"

She confessed that in her selection of books to notice she was guided by A. W. Schlegel; otherwise, she added, a whole life would not have been sufficient to collect such information. This confession was not necessary for me. She says she is about to write a book on the French Revolution and on the state of England, in which she means to show that all the calamities which have arisen in France proceeded from not following the English constitution. She says she has a number of questions to put to me concerning the English law, and which she is to reduce to writing. We talked on politics. She still thinks that unless Buonaparte fall he will find means to retrieve his fortune. Perhaps she is still influenced by French sentiments in conceiving that Buonaparte must be victorious at last if he persist in the war. But she is nevertheless a bigoted admirer of our government, which she considers to be perfect!

COLERIDGE TO H. C. R.

Monday Morning, December 7th, 1812.

Letter by Coleridge.

Excuse me for again repeating my request to you, to use your best means as speedily as possible to procure for me (if possible) the perusal of Goethe's work on Light and Colour.* In a thing I have now on hand it would be of very important service to me; at the same time do not forget Jacobi to Fichte,† and whatever other work may have bearings on the Neuere, neueste, und allerneueste Filosofie. It is my hope and purpose to devote a certain portion of my time for the next twelve months to theatrical attempts, and chiefly to the melodrama, or comic opera kind; and from Goethe (from what I read of his little Singspiele in the volume which you lent me) I expect no trifling assistance, especially in the songs, airs, &c., and the happy mode of introducing them. In my frequent conversations with W. (a composer and music-seller), I could not find that he or the music-sellers in general had any knowledge of those compositions, which are so deservedly dear to the German public. As soon as I can disembarrass myself, I shall make one sturdy effort to understand music myself, so far at least of the science as goes to the composition of a simple air. For

* "Goethe's Theory of Colours. Translated from the German; with notes by Charles Lock Eastlake, R.A., F.R.S." London, 1840.

† Jacobi's "Sendschreiben an Fichte."

Chap. xvi. 1813.

I seem frequently to form such in my own mind, to my inner ear. When you write to Bury, do not forget to assure Mrs. Clarkson of my never altered and unalterable esteem and affection.

S. T. Coleridge.

A pun of C. Lamb's.

December 30th.—After dinner a rubber at Lamb's; then went with Lamb and Burney to Rickman's. Hazlitt there. Cards, as usual, were our amusement. Lamb was in a pleasant mood. Rickman produced one of Chatterton's forgeries. In one manuscript there were seventeen different kinds of e's. "Oh," said Lamb, "that must have been written by one of the "Mob of gentlemen who write with ease."

Flaxman.

December 31st.—Spent the evening at Flaxman's. A New Year's party. It consisted only of the Pordens, some of Mrs. Flaxman's family, and one or two others. We were comfortable enough without being outrageously merry. Flaxman, of all the great men I ever knew, plays the child with the most grace. He is infinitely amiable, without losing any of his respectability. It is obvious that his is the relaxation of a superior mind, without, however, any of the ostentation of condescension. We stayed late, and the New Year found us enjoying ourselves.

CHAPTER XVII.

1814.

John Buncle.

January 2nd.—Read lately the first volume of "John Buncle."* It contains but little that is readable, but that little is very pleasing. The preachments are to be skipped over, but the hearty descriptions of character are very interesting from the love with which they are penned. Lamb says, with his usual felicity, that the book is written in better spirits than any book he knows.† Amory's descriptions are in a high style; his scene-painting is of the first order; and it is the whimsical mixture of romantic scenery, millennium-hall society, and dry disputation in a quaint style, which gives this book so strange and amusing a character. For instance, John Buncle meets a lady in a sort of Rosamond's bower studying Hebrew. He is smitten with her charms, declares his love to "glorious Miss Noel," and when, on account of so slight an acquaintance—that of an hour—she repels him (for his love had been kindled only by a desperately learned speech of hers on the paradisiacal

C. Lamb.

John Buncle.

* The "Life of John Buncle, Esq.; containing various Observations and Reflections made in several Parts of the World, and many extraordinary Relations." By THOMAS AMORY. Hollis, 1766. Two vols.

† "John (says Leigh Hunt) is a kind of innocent Henry the Eighth of private life, without the other's fat, fury, and solemnity. He is a prodigious hand at matrimony, at divinity, at a song, at a loud 'hem,' and at a turkey and chine."

In No. 10 of Leigh Hunt's London Journal (June 4, 1834), there is an abstract of "John Buncle."

CHAP. XVII.
1814.

language), and threatens to leave him, he exclaims, "Oh, I should die were you to leave me; therefore, if you please, we will discourse of the miracle of Babel." And then follows a long dialogue on the confusion of tongues, in which "illustrious Miss Noel" bears a distinguished part.

Kean as Richard III.

March 7th.—At Drury Lane, and saw Kean for the first time. He played Richard, I believe, better than any man I ever saw; yet my expectations were pitched too high, and I had not the pleasure I expected. The expression of malignant joy is the one in which he surpasses all men I have ever seen. And his most flagrant defect is want of dignity. His face is finely expressive, though his mouth is not handsome, and he projects his lower lip ungracefully; yet it is finely suited to Richard. He gratified my eye more than my ear. His action very often was that of Kemble, and this was not the worst of his performance; but it detracts from his boasted originality. His declamation is very unpleasant, but my ear may in time be reconciled to it, as the palate is to new cheese and tea. It often reminds me of Blanchard's. His speech is not fluent, and his words and syllables are too distinctly separated. His finest scene was with Lady Anne, and his mode of lifting up her veil to watch her countenance was exquisite. The concluding scene was unequal to my expectation, though the fencing was elegant, and his sudden death-fall was shockingly real. But he should have lain still. Why does he rise, or awake rather, to repeat the spurious lines? He did not often excite a strong persuasion of the truth of his acting, and the applause he received was not very great. Mrs. Glover had infinitely more in the pathetic scene in which she, as Queen Elizabeth, parts from her children. To recur to Kean, I do not think he will retain all his popularity, but he may learn to deserve it better, though I think he will never be qualified for heroic parts. He wants a commanding figure and a powerful voice. His greatest excellences are a fine pantomimic face and remarkable agility.

Horne Tooke.

March 26th.—I read Stephens's "Life of Horne Tooke." All the anecdotes respecting him, as well as his letters, are excellent. They raise a favourable impression of his integrity, and yet this stubborn integrity was blended with so impassioned a hatred, that it is difficult to apportion the praise and reproach which his admirers and enemies, with perhaps equal injustice, heap upon him.

Abdication of Buonaparte.

April 10th.—Went early to the coffee-room. To-day it was fully confirmed that Buonaparte had voluntarily abdicated the thrones of France and Italy, and thus at once, as by the stroke of an enchanter's wand, the revolutionary government of France, after tormenting the world for nearly twenty-five years, has quietly yielded up its breath.

Settling of Europe.

April 12th.—Again at the coffee-room in the morning, though now the public papers must of necessity decline in interest. There must follow the winding up of accounts, and there may arise disputes in the appropriation of territory and in the fixing of constitutions; but no serious obstacle in the way of peace is to be apprehended. My wish is that means could be found, without violating the honour of the allies, to break the treaty so imprudently made with that arch-knave Murat. Bernadotte ought to retain his crown, but I should be glad to see Norway succeed in emancipating herself from his dominion, so unworthily obtained. Saxony ought to revert to the house which lost it during the wars produced by the Reformation, and the Duke of Weimar deserves to succeed to his ancestors. Poland has no chance of regaining her independence, and perhaps would not be able to make use of it. Russia will descend deeper into Europe than I can contemplate without anxiety, notwithstanding the actual merits of her Emperor. Prussia I wish to see mistress of all Protestant Germany; and it would give me joy to see the rest of Germany swallowed up by Austria; but this will not be. The Empire will, I fear, be restored, and with it the foundation laid for future wars of intrigue. France will resume her influence over Europe; and this is the one evil I apprehend from the restoration of the Bourbons—that the jealousy which ought to survive against France, as France, will sleep in the ashes of the Napoleon dynasty. Such are my wishes, hopes, fears, and expectations.

H. C. R.'s prophecy respecting European politics.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

State of mind in England.

The counter-revolution in France has not gratified our vanity. It comes like a blessing of Providence or a gift of nature, and these are received with quiet gratitude. Hence the want of enthusiasm in the public mind, although the general sentiment is joy. Cobbett and Sir Richard Phillips* alone express sorrow, and the Morning Chronicle betrays an unpatriotic spirit. Of

* The author and bookseller. He was editor and proprietor of the Monthly Magazine, and was the compiler of many popular volumes.

my own personal acquaintance, only Will Hazlitt and poor Capel Lofft are among the malcontents.

Flaxman on Lawrence.

May 7th.—Took tea at Flaxman's. He spoke highly of the great variety of talents possessed by Lawrence. On occasion of the contest for the professorship of painting between Opie and Fuseli, Flaxman says, Lawrence made an extempore speech in support of Fuseli better than any speech he (Flaxman) ever heard. "But," said Flaxman, "Lawrence's powers are almost his ruin. He is ever in company. One person admires his singing, another his reading, another his conversational talents, and he is overwhelmed with engagements. I have heard Hazlitt say, 'No good talker will ever labour enough to become a good painter.'"

Friendship.

May 15th.—Called on the Colliers. I am glad to feel that there is a return of cordiality which had been on the decline between me and these old friends. There is so much positive pleasure in every kindly feeling, that certainly it is not wisdom to criticise whether it is justified. Friendship, more assuredly than virtue, is its own reward. Lamb and his sister were there, and expressed great kindness towards me, which gave me much pleasure. They are, indeed, among the very best of persons. Their moral qualities are as distinguished as their intellectual.

The Lambs.

Kean as Othello.

May 19th.—I accompanied Anthony and Mrs. Robinson to Drury Lane to see Kean play Othello. The long trial of waiting before the door having been endured, the gratification was very great. Of all the characters in which I have yet seen Kean, Othello is the one for which by nature he is the least qualified; yet it is the one in which he has most delighted me. Kean has little grace or beauty in mere oratorical declamation, but in the bursts of passion he surpasses any male actor I ever saw. His delivery of the speech in which he says, "Othello's occupation's gone," was as pathetic as a lover's farewell to his mistress. I could hardly keep from crying; it was pure feeling. In the same scene the expression of rage is inimitable.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

Dinner at G. Young's.

May 26th.—Dined with Mr. George Young.* A large party. Present were Dr. Spurzheim, now the lion of the day, as the apostle of craniology—ten years ago he was the famulus of the discoverer Gall; Mason Good, poet, lecturer, and surgeon; Drs. Gooch and Parke; my friend Hamond; Charles Young, the rival of Kean at Covent Garden, and another brother of our host; Ayton, an attorney; and Westall, the R.A. Spurzheim appeared to advantage as the opponent of Mason Good, who was wordy, and I thought opposed close intellectual reasoning by a profusion of technicalities. Spurzheim preached from the skulls of several of us, and was tolerably successful in his guesses, though not with me, for he gave me theosophy, and tried to make a philosopher of me. To Hamond he gave the organs of circumspection and the love of children. To Charles Young that of representation, but he probably knew he was an actor.

Stephen.

May 27th.—The forenoon at the Old Bailey Sessions. Walked back with Stephen.† He related that Romilly thinks Lord Eldon one of the profoundest and most

* An eminent surgeon, of whom more hereafter.

† The emancipationist. He was brother-in-law to Wilberforce, and the father of the late Sir James Stephen, the Professor of History.

learned lawyers who ever lived; yet he considers his infirmity as a practical doubter so fatal, that he infinitely prefers Erskine as a Chancellor. Though his mind and legal habits are of so different a class, his good sense and power of prompt decision enable him to administer justice usefully.

Procession.

June 18th.—This was a high festival in the City, the corporation giving a superb entertainment to the Prince Regent and his visitors, the Emperor of Russia, King of Prussia, &c. Took a hasty dinner at Collier's, and then witnessed the procession from Fleet Street. It was not a gratifying spectacle, for there was no continuity in the scene; but some of the distinct objects were interesting. The Royal carriages were splendid, but my ignorance of the individuals who filled them prevented my having much pleasure. My friend Mrs. W. Pattisson brought her boys to see the sight, and she did wisely, for she has enriched their memories with recollections which time will exalt to great value. It will in their old age be a subject of great pleasure that at the ages of eleven and ten they beheld the persons of the greatest sovereigns of the time, and witnessed the festivities consequent on the peace which fixed (may it prove so!) the independence and repose of Europe.

Lord Cochrane.

June 21st.—Again in the King's Bench. The sentence of the pillory was passed against Lord Cochrane and others for a fraud to raise the price of stock by spreading false news. The severity of the sentence has turned public opinion in favour of his Lordship, and they who first commiserated him began afterwards to think him innocent. His appearance to-day was certainly pitiable. When the sentence was passed he stood without colour in his face, his eye staring and without expression; and when he left the court it was with difficulty, as if he were stupified.*

Chap. xvii. — 1814.

Lamb.

June 29th.—Called on Lamb in the evening. Found him as delighted as a child with a garret he had appropriated and adorned with all the copper-plate engravings he could collect, having rifled every book he possesses for the purpose. It was pleasant to observe his innocent delight. Schiller says all great men have a childlikeness in their nature.

A walk with C. Lamb.

July 3rd.—A day of great pleasure. Charles Lamb and I walked to Enfield by Southgate, after an early breakfast in his chambers. We were most hospitably received by Anthony Robinson and his wife. After tea, Lamb and I returned. The whole day most delightfully fine, and the scenery very agreeable. Lamb cared for the walk more than the scenery, for the enjoyment of which he seems to have no great susceptibility. His great delight, even in preference to a country walk, is a stroll in London. The shops and the busy streets, such as Thames Street, Bankside, &c., are his great favourites. He, for the same reason, has no great relish for landscape painting. But his relish for historic painting is

* Lord Dundonald, in a note to an extract from Campbell's "Lives of the Chief Justices," where it is mentioned that he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, says:—

"This vindictive sentence the Government did not dare carry out. My high-minded colleague, Sir Francis Burdett, told the Government that, if the sentence was carried into effect, he would stand in the pillory beside me, when they must look to the consequences. What these might have been, in the then excited state of the public mind, as regarded my treatment, the reader may guess."—The Autobiography of a Seaman. By Thomas, Tenth Earl of Dundonald, G.C.B. Second edition. London, 1861. Vol. II., p. 322, note.

exquisite. Lamb's peculiarities are very interesting. We had not much conversation—he hummed tunes, I repeated Wordsworth's "Daffodils," of which I am become very fond. Lamb praised T. Warton's "Sonnet in Dugdale" as of first-rate excellence.* It is a good thought, but I find nothing exquisite in it. He praised Prior's courtly poems—his "Down Hall"—his fine application of the names of Marlborough, so as to be offensive in the ears of Boileau.

Flaxman.

July 4th.—Took early tea with Flaxman, to whom I read an admirable criticism by Hazlitt on West's picture of the "Rejection of Christ." A bitter and severe but most excellent performance. Flaxman was constrained to admit the high talent of the criticism, though he was unaffectedly pained by its severity; but he was himself offended by West's attempt to represent this sacred subject.

Dr. Tiarks.

July 6th.—Dr. Tiarks † breakfasted with me, and we spent an hour and a half very pleasantly. Tiarks says that he understands Buonaparte said to the Austrian commissioner, "The king of Saxony is the honestest king in Europe. If the allies dethrone him they will do a more tyrannical act than I ever did. I have dethroned many kings in my time, but I was a parvenu, and it was necessary for my safety. The old legitimate sovereigns should act on other principles."

* This Sonnet was "Written in a Blank Leaf of Dugdale's 'Monasticon.'"

† A Frieslander by birth, he became a candidate in theology at Göttingen, but had notice that he had been drawn as a conscript, and would be seized as such. Flying from the army, he begged his way to England, where he maintained himself first as a private librarian to Sir Joseph Banks, and afterwards, with considerable success, as a teacher of German, Greek, and mathematics.—H. C. R.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

Bentham.

July 29th.—Mr. Wakefield called on me with Jeremy Bentham's "Panopticon," and he occupied me till one o'clock. Wakefield belongs to Jerémy Bentham's select society. He is voted nobody, i.e. free of the house. He gives an interesting account of the philosopher's abode, where a Panopticon school is to be erected. Bentham's constant inmates are Koe, whom I have seen, and Mill, whom I dined with at Hamond's, and whom Wakefield represents as one of the greatest men of the present day. He is writing a history of India. Wakefield says that Bentham has considerable respect for Hamond's understanding.

James Mill.

July 31st.—Read Bentham's "Panopticon" and first Appendix. All that respected the moral economy of his plan interested me greatly, but for want of plates I could not comprehend the mechanical structure. The book is (as all Bentham's are), full of original and very valuable matter. But it would possibly have had more effect if it had contained fewer novelties in substance and in language. Men are prepared to oppose when novelty is ostentatiously announced.

Wordsworth's Excursion.

August 13th.—(At Norwich.) Accompanied some friends to the theatre. The actors did not edify me. Stole out to call on Madge, at whose apartments I found the great new poem of Wordsworth, "The Excursion." I could only look into the preface and read a few extracts with Madge. It is a poem of formidable size, and I fear too mystical to be popular. It will, however, put an end to the sneers of those who consider, or affect to consider, him puerile. But it will possibly draw on him the imputation of dulness. Still, I trust it will strengthen the zeal of his few friends. My anxiety is great to read it.

Kastner.

August 18th.—Tiarks brought Kastner to me. Kastner is an enthusiast, but his enthusiasm impels to action, and it is accompanied by talent of very high rank and great variety. Having distinguished himself as a chemist he became Volksredner (orator for the people); and he is now striving to interest the Government in favour of freemasonry, in order to oppose priestcraft, which he thinks is reviving. He also conducted a newspaper, and assisted in raising the Prussian Landwehr. Having fought with this body in France, he came to England to solicit a grant out of the contributions for the Germans in favour of the Landwehr. Though every one thought his attempts vain, he has succeeded in obtaining £1,000, and hopes for much more, out of the Parliamentary grant.

H. C. R. to Mrs. Pattisson.

Bury St. Edmunds, July 27th, 1814.

My dear Friend,

Though my own plans were in some measure disarranged by it, I was sincerely glad to hear that you had resolved to undertake the northern journey. I trust it has proved to you a source of other pleasures than those for the sake of which you made it. The reward which Solomon received for a wise choice of the blessings of life I have very frequently seen conferred on a small scale. . . . . . I should be very glad if some accident were to bring you acquainted with any of the Stansfelds. That is so highly estimable a family, that I could almost consider myself the friend of every member of it, meaning only to express my very peculiar esteem for them. . . . . . .

CHAP. XVII.
—
1814.

I have just risen from the perusal of the most admirable discourse on friendship which I believe was ever penned. It is a sort of sermon without a text by Jeremy Taylor; so delightful that, if I had no other means of conveying it to you, I think I could almost walk to Witham from Bury with the folio volume containing it in my hand, in order to have the delight of reading it to you. Though it is arrant pedantry to fill a letter with quotations, I cannot resist the temptation of quoting two or three golden sayings.

Soame Jenyns, you may recollect, vindicates Christianity for excluding from its system those false virtues, patriotism, valour, and friendship!!! This very insidious paradox—in effect, not intention, I mean—is as to friendship, with equal truth and beauty, thus exhibited by Jeremy Taylor:—"By friendship you mean the greatest love, the greatest usefulness, and the most open communication, and the noblest sufferings, and the severest truth, and the heartiest counsel, and the greatest union of minds, of which brave men and women are capable. But then I must tell you that Christianity hath new christened it, and called it charity. . . . . . Christian charity is friendship to all the world. And when friendships were the noblest things in the world" (referring, I suspect, to Cicero, &c.), "charity was little, like the sun drawn in at a chink, or his beams drawn into the centre of a burning-glass; but Christian charity is friendship expanded, like the face of the sun when it mounts the eastern hills." Still, the individual appropriation of love was to be explained ; he therefore goes on, "There is enough in every man that is willing to make him become our friend, but where men contract friendships they enclose the commons, and what nature intended should be every man's, we make proper to two or three." In these lines are contained all the ideas necessary to a development of friendship speculatively. The following sentences are gems:—"He that does a base thing in zeal for his friend, burns the golden thread that ties their hearts together." "Secrecy is the chastity of friendship." "Friendship is charity in society."

If I can, I will take a bait at Witham on my way from Norwich to London ; but I do not know that I can stay even a day with you. One circumstance may call me to town earlier than I might otherwise have thought necessary. I have received some letters from a most amiable and worthy man, a Jena acquaintance, who has made a journey to London, in order to solicit relief for a particular class of sufferers—the Prussian Landwehr. He seems to expect great assistance from me, and it will be a painful task to me to show him that I can do nothing. He is a benevolent Quixote. He has written me an account of his life, and his sufferings and pathetic tale will interest you. He is made up of love of every kind—to his wife and children, to his country, for which he fought, and to religion, to which he seems devotedly attached. I wrote to Aders to offer Kastner my chambers during my absence ; but Aders has procured him a lodging at six shillings a week. Kastner has luckily met with my friends in town.

You will expect to hear of the success of my Sessions Circuit. It was not so productive as I expected, from the retirement of Twiss, but this was more from the want of business than from the preference of others before me. At Norwich and Bury, I had more than my reasonable share of business. At Bury, not even Alderson held a brief, or had a motion; the very little was divided between Storks and myself, I taking a third. However, my individual success is great, though the decline of professional business in general is enough to alarm a man now entering into it. Lawyers have had their day!

Your affectionate Friend,
H. C. Robinson.

Annual excursions.

*Rem.—During my fifteen years at the Bar, I relieved myself from the dulness of a London professional life by annual excursions, of all of which I kept Journals. In collecting reminiscences from them, I shall for the most part omit descriptions of places, and confine myself to the persons I saw. The present journey in France immediately followed that great event, the restoration of the French monarchy, after twenty-five years of revolution.

Duchesnois.

August 26th.—Arrived at Rouen in the evening, and heard that Mademoiselle Duchesnois was to perform. Tired and even hungry as I was, I instantly set out for the theatre, and went into the pit, which had no seats,

* Written in 1850.

Hamlet in French.

and where the audience was very low. The play was the "Hamlet," not of Shakespeare but of Ducis, and therefore the first impression was a very mixed one. On my entrance Duchesnois, as Queen, was relating to her confidante the history of her two marriages. So much I could understand, and that was all; and this annoyed me. Then the actress herself was really ugly. But, in spite of all this, such is the power of real talent, that in a very short time I caught myself violently applauding. Of the actress's declamation I was no judge, but of course it was good, as the French are inexorable on this point. I could, however, feel the truthfulness of her expression of passion. Her tones were pathetic. Yet there must be something conventional in such things. Of the other actors I have nothing to say; nor of the play, but that it is truly French. The unities are preserved, and Hamlet is victorious. No more need be said. But what was more remarkable than the play was the display of national feeling. At Dieppe, indeed, the children had shouted after us in the street, "Allez vous en;" and in the scene in which Shakespeare has but a poor joke about the English being mad, Ducis has substituted a line of grave reproach,—

French antipathy towards the English.

"L'Angleterre fut toujours dans les crimes féconde."

On this the fellows who were next me all turned their faces towards me and clapped lustily. I may mention that, after dinner, as I was walking, I stopped to talk with a peasant, who laid down his tool and jumped over a ditch to chat with me. He was a strong anti-revolu-

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

tionist. The good king, he said, must take care to disband his army, or he would never be safe. The army are friendly to the Emperor, their opinions about him having a great deal of a professional character.

August 29th.—I went by the lower road to Paris in a diligence through St. Germains, &c., and arrived at Paris the next day; and an accident led me at once to a decent hotel in the Rue Montmartre. Fortunately for me, Mr. Clarkson is here, hoping by personal intercourse with the Emperor of Russia, Duke of Wellington, &c., to obtain some stringent measures to enforce the abolition of the slave-trade. Mrs. Clarkson is with him.

Clarkson.

September 1st.—I walked with John Thelwall and his party to the famous Château or prison of Vincennes, being introduced to the governor by the curate. We afterwards dined at a restaurant and walked back. As we reached the barrière, Thelwall discovered that he had lost his purse, containing about twenty napoleons. He recollected taking it out of his pocket to pay for the dinner. We all returned with him to the hotel; the house was shut. On knocking, a chamber-window was opened, and we heard a female voice exclaim, "Ah! ce sont Messieurs les Anglais, pour la bourse!" The maid and her mistress came down together; the former, who had found the purse on the table, had it in her hand, with an expression of great joy at being able to restore it; and she received Thelwall's present very becomingly.

Vincennes.

Honest French girl.

September 2nd.—I accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Clarkson to the library of the institution at the Quatre Nations, where I was introduced to the celebrated ex-

Bishop Grégoire.

Bishop of Blois, Grégoire, leader of the society of the Amis des Noirs, which made him the close ally of Clarkson.

*Rem.—I acquired the privilege of calling on Grégoire on my future visits to Paris, and generally availed myself of it. The impression he made on me to-day was not removed by the disgrace cast on him afterwards. He seemed to me to be a kind-hearted, benevolent man, with no great strength of understanding, and somewhat of a petit-maître in his habits.

David.

September 4th.—I accompanied the Thelwall party to the Louvre, and thence to the house of David, who was there the exhibitor of his own paintings. Whether it was because I knew him to have been the friend of Robespierre, and a member of the Revolutionary tribunal, or not, I cannot say, but his countenance seemed to me to express ferocity. It was deformed by a hare-lip.

Mob applause.

September 7th.—The consecration of the colours of the National Guard, at which attended the King and all the authorities of Paris, was of course not to be neglected. The applause given to the King was faint. From a few there were loud cries. One voice was remarkable, and I recognized it on several days.

Talleyrand.

September 8th.—I had the satisfaction of recognizing Talleyrand from his resemblance to the engravings of him. The expression of his countenance as he passed was, I thought, that of a voluptuary and a courtier, rather than that of a politician and man of business. He spoke to his coachman in an arrogant tone. His thin legs and sorry figure below the waist hardly justify

* Written in 1850.

Chap. xvii. — 1814.

the term cripple; but I looked for and perceived the club-foot, to remove all doubt as to his identity. I fancy I can judge better of Talleyrand's character from having had a glimpse of his person.

H. C. R's brother, T. R.

September 9th.—My brother was with me at the Théâtre Français, and I was amused by being asked twice whether he was not "le grand tragique Kemble—celui qui joue les premières rôles à Londres." The inquirers seemed to disbelieve my denial.

La Fayette.

September 10th and 11th.—These days were distinguished by my being in the company of one of the most remarkable men of the French Revolution, General La Fayette. By no means one of the ablest or greatest, but I believe, in intention at least, one of the best; and one who has been placed in positions both of danger and of show at critical moments beyond every other individual. Of all the revolutionary leaders, he is the one of whom I think most favourably; and my favourable impression was enhanced by what I heard from him. I was with Mr. Clarkson when La Fayette called on him, and I was greatly surprised at his appearance. I expected to see an infirm old man, on whose countenance I should trace the marks of suffering from long imprisonment and cruel treatment. I saw a hale man with a florid complexion, and no signs of age about him. In fact, he is fifty-seven years old, his reddish complexion clear, his body inclining to be stout. His tone of conversation is staid, and he has not the vivacity commonly ascribed to Frenchmen. There is apparently nothing enthusiastic about him.

The slave-trade was the subject which brought the General and Clarkson together, and it engrossed, I thought, too much of the conversation. La Fayette confirmed Clarkson's opinion, that the Emperor of Russia was perfectly sincere and even zealous in the wish which he expressed at Madame de Staël's, in opposition to the Portuguese Minister, to secure the abolition of the slave-trade. He also gave credit to Talleyrand for his sincerity in the same wish ; "but certainly," said La Fayette, "he is not an enthusiast in anything." Among the subjects of reproach against Buonaparte was his restoration of slavery ; and La Fayette imputed to him an artifice by which he had made it appear that La Fayette had sold slaves. He had purchased an estate in order to assist the abolition, and when slavery was abolished by law, he sold the estate, and the notary put the word slaves into the contract. La Fayette refused to sign unless the word was erased. "But," said the notary, "if there are none, the word has no effect, and no one can tell what may happen." La Fayette inferred from this that the scheme to restore slavery was formed, which did soon take place. And though he had done all he could by law to declare these slaves free, they were made slaves at last.

CHAP. XVII.
1814.
La Fayette and the Slave-trade.

I was particularly desirous of hearing from La Fayette himself some account of the relation in which he stood towards Buonaparte, and of knowing his opinion of the Emperor. In this I was gratified. He related that, after enduring a severe imprisonment of three years in an Austrian dungeon,* on which he Buonaparte's relation to La Fayette.

* In the fortress of Olmutz in Moravia.

Chap. xvii. — 1814.

seemed unwilling to enlarge, he was at last set at liberty because the French Directory refused to discuss the terms of the treaty at Leoben until he and his friends were released. Buonaparte was one of the commissioners in making that treaty, and he executed his orders with firmness. La Fayette went at first to Hamburg, and would not proceed at once to Paris, because a declaration was required of him which he could not make. At the time of the negotiations about him the revolution of Fructidor took place, when two of the Directory were sent to Cayenne. "Now," said La Fayette, "I was called upon to make such an acknowledgment as would give all the credit of my release to those remaining in power. This I refused." This would have given the men then in power all the éclat of his deliverance. But on the revolution which made Buonaparte First Consul, he went to Paris without a passport. He had scarcely arrived when he was waited upon by—I doubt whether Duroc or Caulaincourt, who said that the First Consul wished him to return to Hamburg secretly, in order that he might show his high esteem for him by calling him back in a formal manner. "I saw through the trick," said La Fayette, "and would not be a party to it. I therefore said that I had come back because I had a right, being a Frenchman who had committed no crime; that if the chief magistrate commanded me to go I would obey. I was told that the First Consul meant only to do me honour. Though I had defeated his scheme of doing an act of ostentatious display, he received me with politeness; and for a time I was deceived, but not long, and I never concealed my opinion of him. I saw him eight or ten times on business, and at a fête given by Joseph Buonaparte on the peace between France and America (for the Directory had made a war as foolish as your present war with America) we had some conversation. He assured me that his designs were all in favour of liberty, and that whatever might appear to be otherwise would be only temporary expedients. I answered that it was the direction (tendency) of some of his actions that I disapproved of more than of the actions themselves. On another occasion Buonaparte said to me, 'You see the French are tired of liberty.' I answered, 'They are tired of licentiousness, and what they have suffered from the abuse of liberty makes them more anxious to have real liberty, and more fit to enjoy it; and this, Citizen First Consul, the French expect from you. Buonaparte turned away, but in a few minutes came back and talked on indifferent subjects. After this I retired into the country, and took no share in public business. Buonaparte afterwards tried to involve me in some sham plot, but my entire seclusion rendered that impossible. When Buonaparte returned from Russia he made a speech, in which he spoke of the anti-monarchical principles of the first authors of the Revolution, which made them impede the measures of the Government, alluding to, but not naming, me."

Buonaparte.

I have pleasure in writing down these recollections of La Fayette's words, because they are distinct, and because they disprove what has been falsely asserted by the partisans of Buonaparte, that La Fayette was reconciled to him.

CHAP. XVII.
1814.

La Fayette's anticipations.

Of the future, La Fayette spoke with a hope which it gratified me to hear, and he spoke respectfully of the royal family then restored. On general subjects I have a few notes worth abridging. He asserted that the manners of the French, especially the lower classes, had been improved by the Revolution; that the mob of France were less violent than an English mob; and the common people he thought more honest. This he ascribed to the Revolution.

America.

La Fayette is a strong partisan of America, as opposed to England. He is strongly opposed to our maritime claims, and thinks we might concede these in return for the renunciation of the slave-trade by other powers.

On my relating that, at the distribution of the colours, I heard some exclamations of "Vive l'Empereur," La Fayette said, "You are not to suppose that this proceeded from love to Buonaparte. It was only a mode of showing dissatisfaction with the present state of things, and because it would not do to cry 'A bas le roi,' or 'A bas les ministères.'"

Of Spanish America he said, that Jefferson was of opinion that those states would ultimately become independent, but that this would rather retard than advance civilization.

Malmaison.

Rem.—I visited the residence of Josephine at Malmaison, which has left a more distinct impression on my mind than the other regal palaces of the capital. One picture there impressed me so strongly that I have never forgotten it. Of the artistic merits I know nothing. It was a prison scene. A man in chains has drawn with chalk a figure of the Virgin and Child, which the other prisoners are worshipping; that is, they are kneeling,—all except one wretch who is in despair, the officers of justice having come to take him to the gallows.

* Written in 1850.

Count St. Maurice.

I read also in my Journal a name which brings to my recollection a fact omitted in the Journal itself. The name is Count St. Maurice, an elegant cavalier, an emigrant and high-toned royalist, also a warm abolitionist. One day, when I was present, Clarkson saying that he was going to see La Fayette and Grégoire, the Count, in a plaintive rather than reproachful tone, said, "My dear sir, I wish you did not see so much of those people." Clarkson replied, very gravely, "Monsieur le Comte, you forget that now that I am at Paris, I know but two classes of persons—the friends and the enemies of Africa. All the friends of Africa are my friends, whatever they may be besides. You and Monsieur La Fayette are the same in my eyes." St. Maurice smiled and said, "I believe you are in the right."

Mrs. Siddons.

September 22nd.—I was in the grand gallery at the Louvre when I heard some one say, "Mrs. Siddons is below." I instantly left the Raphaels and Titians, and went in search of her, and my Journal says: "I am almost ashamed to confess that the sight of her gave me a delight beyond almost any I have received in Paris." I had never seen her so near. She was walking with Horace Twiss's mother. I kept as near her as I could with decorum, and without appearing to be watching her; yet there was something about her that disturbed me. So glorious a head ought not to have been covered with a small chip hat. She knit her brows, too, on looking at the pictures, as if to assist a failing sight. But I recognized her fascinating smile with delight, though there was a line or two about her mouth which I thought coarse.

* "Stella drawing a Picture of the Virgin and Child on his Prison Wall." Painted by Granet, at Rome, in 1810. The picture was purchased by the Empress, and was afterwards transported to Munich. It now forms part of the Leuchtenberg Collection, No. 245, and has been engraved by Muxel. Stella, on his arrival in Rome, was arrested, but soon after found innocent and liberated So late as the end of the eighteenth century, this sketch of the Madonna was shown to travellers in Rome.—G. S.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

A fault-finding companion discarded.

September 23rd.—At the Jardin des Plantes with E. Hamond's friend, R——, and we spent great part of the day together. I believe it was not on this, but some other day, when R—— said, "I will call for you to-morrow," I answered, "I will thank you not to call. I would rather not see anything else with you, and I will tell you frankly why. I am come to Paris to enjoy myself, and that enjoyment needs the accompaniment of sympathy with others. Now, you dislike everything, and find fault with everything. You see nothing which you do not find inferior to what you have seen before. This may be all very true, but it makes me very uncomfortable. I believe, if I were forced to live with you, I should kill myself. So I shall be glad to see you in London, but no more in Paris."

French Courts of Justice.

*Rem.—I several times attended French Courts of

* Written in 1850.

Justice, and heard both arguments before judges and trials in criminal cases before juries. I have no remark to make on the arguments, for I never understood them sufficiently; and, indeed, I very imperfectly understood the examination of witnesses; but I did understand enough to enable me to come to this conclusion, that if I were guilty, I should wish to be tried in England—if innocent, in France. Making this remark once to Southey, he changed the expression and said, "The English system seems to have for its object that no innocent person should be unjustly found guilty—the French system, that no criminal should escape." Now, if it be the fact that of the accused by far the greater number are guilty, it will follow that injustice is more frequent in the English than in the French courts.

Criminal procedure in the French courts.

It is customary for the admirer of English law to boast of that feature of it which prohibits all attempts to make the prisoner convict himself, as if the State, represented in the Court, had not a right to the truth, and as if a man who had violated the law were privileged through the violation. This surely betrays want of discrimination. It is right that no violence should be used to compel an answer, because that may as often produce falsehood as truth—nor is any used in the French courts; but the prisoner is interrogated as well as the prosecutor and witnesses, and the same means are used to detect falsehood in all. If he refuse to answer, he is made to understand the unfavourable inferences that will be drawn. And this interrogation taking place before the public, no great injustice can be done. On this point I entirely approve of the French practice.

Chap. XVII. — 1814.

In another material respect, the practice of the English and the French courts is different. In the French courts, the facts being already known by preliminary proceedings, the prisoners are heard, and then the witnesses are called. Their hearing begins with "Contez à la cour les faits"—relate the facts to the court—and then questions follow. This is done in presence of the prisoner, who, if he interrupts, is not silenced or reproved, as he would be in England. I once heard a French prisoner exclaim, "You lie!" An English judge would be in danger of falling into fits at such an outrage. The French President very quietly and even courteously said, "In what does the lie consist?" And the answer being given, he went on—"But you yourself said so and so." And afterwards he said, "But if this is a lie, was that a lie too" (stating something else the witness had said) "which you did not contradict?" In a few minutes the prisoner had involved himself in contradictions which proved his guilt. Who can blame this? Publicity is unquestionably necessary to secure this practice from abuse, and there may be parts of the preliminary proceedings which, if I were acquainted with them, I might disapprove of. I write only of what I witnessed.

There is always an advocate (Procureur du Roi) who represents the Crown, and who gives his judgment as between the prosecutor and the accused; and he retires with the judges.*

Rem.†—One other particular struck me at once, and

* My impression respecting the French courts, as compared with the English, has been confirmed by later visits to them.—H. C. R.

† Written in 1850.

I have urged on English lawyers the propriety of its adoption in our courts—but never with effect, I fear. The prisoner does not stand, but has a little box to himself, with a desk and papers. A soldier, as guard, sits with him. And this box is so placed that he can communicate with his counsel. Our law says, the accused are to be presumed to be innocent until they are proved guilty; and yet on their trial they are degraded by being forced to stand, unless they consent to urge a falsehood, as that they are ill. On application, they are always allowed to sit.

Fleury.

On September 28th I went to the Théâtre Français, to see the greatest of the French comedians. I abstain from writing of the French theatre, as I do of the public buildings, the galleries of paintings, &c., but I may make exceptions. One is in favour of a great theatrical name, Fleury, whom I have seen several times. He was already aged and near the end of his career, yet he appeared to me to be perfect in a certain class of comic characters. Genteel comedy and aged characters were his department. One rôle made a lasting impression. In the "École des Bourgeois," he played a Marquis who is driven to project a mésalliance to recruit his finances; but a blunder of his servant defeats his plan. He delivers to the vulgar family a letter which is written to the Marquis's friend, the Duke. It begins, "Enfin, ce soir je m'encanaille." The opening of this letter, and the repetition of the words by every one of the party was excellent, especially the spelling of the word encanaille by the servant. In the midst of a family of enragés, the Marquis makes his appearance. The gay impudence with which he met their rage reminded me of a similar character by Iffland. Though I could not relish French tragedy, I thought the comedy perfection—and I still think so. Our best comedians are gross caricaturists in comparison. The harmonious keeping and uniformly respectable acting at the Théâtre Français, even in the absence of their stars, are what give the French stage its superiority over the English. Yet the Français had ceased to be popular. The little Boulevard theatres were crowded, while the Français was empty. Two admirable low comedians I enjoyed this year at the Porte St. Martin—Brunet and Pothier. But I did not this time see the two greatest French performers, Talma and Mademoiselle Mars.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

French comedy.

Madame de Staël.

September 29th.—A call on Madame de Staël. She expressed herself strongly in favour of the abolition of the slave-trade, though she was not sanguine of success. She was in Geneva when I arrived in Paris, and regretted that the Clarksons left before her return. From her house, the Château de Clichy, I walked to St. Denis, and on the way met with an adventure.

Adventure with a soldier.

I overtook a French soldier: he had a sunburnt face and a somewhat ruffianly appearance. As I came up to him, he startled me by running up and putting his hands on my shoulders: he said in a loud voice, but with a smiling face which at once removed all fear of violence, "Ah! vous êtes Anglais: que je vous aime! si je n'avais que deux sous, vous en auriez un. Mais si vous étiez Espagnol, je vous égorgerois." And then he shook me as if to show me that he would execute his threat. Before he had explained himself I guessed the fact, and having disengaged myself from his unwelcome embrace, I had a regular conversation with him, and in vain tried to reason with him. He told me that, when in Spain, he was taken prisoner and beaten by the Spaniards. They would have killed him, he said, but the "braves" English rescued him out of their hands. This was the burden of his song. He exhibited his wounds—they were shocking—and he seemed to be capable of no feelings but gratitude and revenge. I said, "You call me a good man; if I had by chance been born in Spain, I should have been what I am now; I could not help it."—"Tant pis pour vous—I would kill you."—"But why? you meet with good people and bad people everywhere."—"Non, pas en Espagne."—"What, kill me, when I have done nothing to you?"—"Si ce n'était pas vous, c'était votre frère; si ce n'était pas votre frère, c'était votre cousin—c'est la même chose. On ne peut pas trouver l'individu—c'est impossible." To strengthen my moral arguments, I treated him with a bottle of wine at an inn on the road.

Dinner at Madame de Staël's.

October 4th.—A dinner at Madame de Staël's, where I had an opportunity of renewing my slight acquaintance with Benjamin Constant and William Schlegel. Constant praised highly the "Dichtung und Wahrheit," which our hostess does not like—how should she? The naïveté of the confessions and sacrifice of dignity to truth were opposed to all the conventionalities to which she was accustomed. Asking Schlegel for an explanation of the title "Dichtung und Wahrheit," he said, "I suppose it is used merely as an apology, if taxed with anything." This was the poorest thing he said. Schlegel asserted that Tieck was sincere in his profession of Catholicism. Fichte, he said, was aware before his death that he had survived his fame. Schlegel spoke of Rogers as the only poet of the old school; the modern English poets having taken a direction like that of the Germans, though without any connection between them. In answer to my inquiries, he said that a national spirit was rising in Germany; but he talked with reserve on politics. Of Arndt, he said that he had not a clear head, but that he had been of use by exciting a sentiment of nationality.

A. W. Schlegel.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

Chantrey.

October 5th.—At the Louvre for the last time. There I met Miss Curran, Dawe, and Chantrey. A remark by the latter struck me, and I made a note of it. "The ancients," he said, "worked with a knowledge of the place where the statue was to be, and anticipated the light to which it would be exposed. If it were to be in the open air, they often introduced folds in the drapery, for the sake of producing a shade." He pointed out to us the bad effect of light from two windows falling on a column.

Travelling companion.

October 8th.—After a five weeks' residence, without a moment's ennui, I left Paris without a moment's regret. D—— was my companion. He was famous for his meanness and love of money, which I turned to account. We went the first day in the cabriolet of a diligence to Amiens, where we spent the night. The next day we proceeded towards the coast. I found that there was only one seat in the cabriolet on this occasion, price 32fr., 40fr. being charged for the interior; on which I said to D——, "Now, we must travel on fair terms. The best place, in fact, is the cheapest, and I don't think it fair that one man should have both advantages; therefore I propose that whoever has the cabriolet shall pay 40fr." He consented; I gave him his choice, and it was amusing to see the eagerness with which he chose the interior.

Coplestone.

My arrangement turned out well, for I had the company of a very sensible, well-informed clergyman, Dr. Coplestone, and we ran a round of literary and political topics. We travelled all night, and breakfasted at Boulogne. It was in the morning that we all walked up a hill to relieve our limbs, when I saw the Doctor talking to a stranger; and referring to him, I said afterwards, "Your friend."—"He is no friend of mine," said Coplestone, angrily; "he is a vulgar ignorant man; I do not know what he is; I thought he was an auctioneer at first; then I took him for a tailor: he may be anything." I heard afterwards from D—— that this stranger had been very annoying in the coach, by talking on every subject very ill. When we came to breakfast he addressed his conversation to me, and having used the word peccadillo, he asked me whether I had ever been in Spain, to which I made no answer. He went on, "Peccadillo is a Spanish word; it means a little sin; it is a compound of two words—pecca, little, and dillo, sin." I happened to catch Coplestone's eye, and encouraging each other, we both laid down our knives and forks and roared outright.*

My first continental trip, after my call to the Bar, has

* Coplestone published a collection of letters, &c., with a Memoir of Lord

Chap. XVII. — 1814.

Review of trip to Paris.

afforded me great pleasure, without at all indisposing me to go on with my trial of the Bar, as a profession. I left many friends in Germany, but in France I have not formed a single acquaintance which is likely to ripen into friendship. A singular fact, because I believe the character of my own mind has much more of the French than of the German in it.

Kastner.

October 14th.—Received a call from Tiarks, for whom I had purchased some books. Kastner, I learned, is still in London. His endeavours to obtain money for the Prussians have been successful, and he is in good spirits about his own affairs. He hopes to have an appointment on the Rhine; and he believes a University will be formed at Bonn.

Walk from Cambridge to Bury.

October 23rd.—Walked from Cambridge to Bury. During the greater part of the time I was reading Schlegel "Ueber die Sprache und Weisheit der Indier." The book on language I could not follow or relish, but the second book on Indian philosophy I found very interesting, and far more intelligible than the other philosophical writings of the author. He treats of the leading doctrines of the Indian philosophers, and represents them as forming epochs in Indian history. The notions concerning the Emanation from the divine mind

F. Schlegel.

Dudley, my slight acquaintance at Corunna. On the appearance of this work an epigram was circulated, ascribed to Croker,—

"Than the first martyr's, Dudley's fate
Still harder must be owned,
Stephen was only stoned to death,
Ward has been Coplestoned."

Samuel Rogers has the credit of having written

"Ward has no heart, they say, but I deny it,
He has a heart, and gets his speeches by it."—H. C. R.

are connected with the doctrine of the pre-existence and transmigration of the soul. These ideas were followed by the worship of nature and its power, out of which sprung the tasteful and various mythology of the Greeks. The doctrine of two principles is treated by Schlegel with more respect than I expected, and that which followed it, and came out of it—Pantheism—with far less. He asserts of Pantheism what I have long felt to be equally true of Schelling's Absolute, that it is destructive of all moral impressions, and productive merely of indifference to good and evil. This little book is an admirable hortative to the study of Oriental literature. Schlegel regards the study of Indian philosophy as a powerful stimulus to the mind, to preserve it from the fatal consequences of modern scepticism and infidelity. It also, he thinks, facilitates the comprehension of the Bible.

Bury Fair.

October 27th.—In the forenoon I went for a few minutes into the fair. It made me melancholy. The sight of Bury Fair affects me like conversation about a deceased friend. Perhaps it would be more correct to say about a friend with whom all acquaintance has ceased. I have no pleasure whatever now in a scene which formerly gave me delight, and I am half-grieved, half-ashamed, to find myself or things so much altered. This is foolish, for why should the man retain the attachments of the boy? But every loss of youthful taste or pleasure is a partial death.

Mrs. Flaxman.

October 31st.—In the afternoon went to Flaxman's. Found Miss Flaxman alone. From her I learnt that, about six weeks ago, Mrs. Flaxman was seized with a paralytic stroke, which had deprived her of the use of her limbs on one side for a time, but from which she had since in a great measure recovered. She is now in Paris with Miss Denman, where she is able to walk. This seizure, though she may survive it many years, will sensibly affect her during her life. I should, indeed, have thought such a blow a sentence of death, with execution respited. But Anthony Robinson informs me that he had a paralytic stroke many years ago, from which he has suffered no evil consequences since. I observed, both to Miss Flaxman this day, and to Anthony Robinson the day after, that I had a presentiment I should myself at some time be attacked with paralysis or apoplexy. They treated this idea as a whim, but I have still the feeling; for I frequently suffer from dizziness, and sometimes feel a tightness over my eyes and in my brain, which, if increased, would, I fancy, produce a paralytic affection. These apprehensions are, however, by no means painful. I am not acquainted with any mode of death which is less fearful in imagination.*

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

Paralysis.

November 13th.—Dined with Mr. Porden, having invited myself thither. A Captain Stavely and Miss Flaxman were there, and afterwards Mr. Flaxman and a Mr. Gunn came. The evening was very pleasantly spent. We talked about Gothic architecture. Mr. Flaxman said he considered it but a degeneracy from the Roman. I observed that it was not enough to say that generally, it should be shown how; that as the Flaxman. Mr. Gunn.

* This anticipation proved wholly groundless, though Mr. Robinson complained of occasional dizziness till his death.

architects of the Middle Ages could not but have some knowledge of the ancient Roman works, of course this knowledge must have influenced their taste, but they might still have views of their own; and certainly the later and purer Gothic did not pretend to the same objects. Flaxman did not object to this. He observed that Gothic, like other architecture, sprang out of the wants of the age, and was to be explained from the customs of the time. The narrow lancet windows were used when glass was little or not at all known, and when a cloth was put up. At this time there were no buttresses, for they were not rendered necessary. But when, glass being introduced, large windows followed, and thin walls were used, buttresses became necessary. It was casually observed this evening, that the Greeks had little acquaintance with the arch. Mr. Gunn observed that the first deviation from the Greek canon was the placing the arch upon instead of between the pillars.* The Greek architecture was adapted to wooden buildings: all the architectural ornaments consist of parts familiar to builders in wood. The arch was easier than the stone architraves, &c., for it might consist of small stones. Speaking of the Lombard columns, Mr. Flaxman said the old architects in the Middle Ages frequently cut up the ancient pillars. The circular corners to the pillars in our churches are frequently subsequent additions to the pillars to give them grace. Mr. Porden is of opinion that Gothic architecture has Gothic architecture.

* In Grecian architecture the arch, as a principle of construction, is not to be found. It was known in the East, and has been met with in the foundations of the Egyptian Pyramids.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

its origin in the East, and Mr. Flaxman seems also to favour this idea. Porden says the historic evidence is great, and the Spanish churches furnish the chain of communication. Flaxman derived the Norman zig-zag from the incapacity of the workmen to produce the flower which was used by the Greeks and Romans. Speaking of ornaments, he said they were all significant among the Greeks: the pattern called the Grecian Key, for instance, was meant to represent the Labyrinth at Crete; and so of a number of decorations which we use without discernment, but which had not lost their symbolic sense among the ancients. Mr. Gunn* I found almost an intolerant enemy to the Gothic. He spoke of "extravagant deviation from good taste" &c., yet I made him confess that the Gothic, though farther from the Greek than the Saxon, was far more beautiful, because it had acquired a consistency and character of its own.

Brougham and Ellenborough.

November 14th.—Spent the forenoon in court. We were all much pleased by a manly and spirited reply of Brougham to Lord Ellenborough. A man convicted of a libel against Jesus Christ offered an affidavit in mitigation, which Lord Ellenborough at first refused to receive, on the ground that if the defendant were the author of the book, there was nothing by which he could swear. When Brougham rose to remark on this, Ellenborough said, "Mr. Brougham, if you are acquainted with this person's faith, you had better suggest some other sanction; you had better confer with him." Brougham said in reply, "It is very unpleasant to be thus mixed up with my client, of whom I know nothing but that I am his retained advocate. As a lawyer and a gentleman, I protest against such insinuations." This he repeated in a tone very impressive. Lord Ellenborough was evidently mortified, and said in a faint voice that no insinuation was intended.

* I afterwards heard that Mr. Gunn, of Norfolk, a man of taste and a traveller, was the clergyman who married the Duke of Sussex to Lady Augusta Murray. This involved him in embarrassments, and was a bar to his future promotion.—H. C. R.

Hazlitt at C. Lamb's.

November 17th.—After nine I went to Charles Lamb's, whose parties are now only once a month. I played a couple of rubbers pleasantly, and afterwards chatted with Hazlitt till one o'clock. He is become an Edinburgh Reviewer through the recommendation of Lady Mackintosh, who had sent to the Champion office to know the author of the articles on Institutions. Hazlitt sent those and other writings to Jeffrey, and has been in a very flattering manner enrolled in the corps. This has put him in good spirits, and he now again hopes that his talents will be appreciated and become a subsistence to him.

C. Lamb.

November 21st.—In the evening I stepped over to Lamb, and sat with him from ten to eleven. He was very chatty and pleasant. Pictures and poetry were the subjects of our talk. He thinks no description in "The Excursion" so good as the history of the country parson who had been a courtier. In this I agree with him. But he dislikes "The Magdalen," which he says would be as good in prose; in which I do not agree with him.

Wordsworth's Excursion.

November 23rd.—This week I finished Wordsworth's poem. It has afforded me less intense pleasure on the whole, perhaps, than I had expected, but it will be a source of frequent gratification. The wisdom and high moral character of the work are beyond anything of the same kind with which I am acquainted, and the spirit of the poetry flags much less frequently than might be expected. There are passages which run heavily, tales which are prolix, and reasonings which are spun out, but in general the narratives are exquisitely tender. That of the courtier parson, who retains in solitude the feelings of high society, whose vigour of mind is unconquerable, and who, even after the death of his wife, appears able for a short time to bear up against desolation and wretchedness, by the powers of his native temperament, is most delightful. Among the discussions, that on Manufactories, in the eighth book, is admirably managed, and forms, in due subordination to the incomparable fourth book, one of the chief excellences of the poem. Wordsworth has succeeded better in light and elegant painting in this poem than in any other. His Hanoverian and Jacobite are very sweet pictures.

Chap. XVII. — 1814.

Kean as Macbeth.

December 1st.—Went to Drury Lane Theatre, where my pleasure was less than I had expected. Kean is not an excellent Macbeth. Nature has denied him a heroic figure and a powerful voice. A mere faculty of exhibiting the stronger malignant passions is not enough for such a character. There is no commanding dignity in Kean, and without this one does not see how he could so easily overawe the Scottish nobility. His dagger scene pleased me less than Kemble's. He saw the dagger too soon, and without any preparatory pause.

Kemble was admirable in the effect he gave to this very bold conception. In his eye you could see when he lost sight of the dagger. But in the scene in which he returns from the murder Kean looks admirably. His death is also very grand. After receiving his death-wound he staggers and gives a feeble blow. After falling he crawls on the floor to reach again his sword, and dies as he touches it. This is no less excellent than his dying in Richard, but varied from it ; so that what is said of Cawdor in the play may be said of Kean, "Nothing in his life became him like the leaving it." In no other respect did he impress me beyond an ordinary actor.

Barnes.

December 7th.—Met Thomas Barnes at a party at Collier's, and chatted with him till late. He related that, at Cambridge, having had lessons from a boxer, he gave himself airs, and meeting with a fellow sitting on a stile in a field, who did not make way for him as he expected, and as he thought due to a gownsman, he asked him what he meant, and said he had a great mind to thrash him. "The man smiled," said Barnes, "put his hand on my shoulder, and said, 'Young man, I'm Cribb.' I was delighted ; gave him my hand ; took him to my room, where I had a wine party, and he was the lion." Cribb was at that time the Champion of England.

Miss Lamb.

December 11th.—After reading at home from eight to ten I called on Miss Lamb, and chatted with her. She was not unwell, but she had undergone great fatigue from writing an article about needlework for the new Ladies' British Magazine. She spoke of writing as a most painful occupation, which only necessity could make her attempt. She has been learning Latin merely to assist her in acquiring a correct style. Yet, while she speaks of inability to write, what grace and talent has she not manifested in "Mrs. Leicester's School," &c.

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

Milner on Ecclesiastical Architecture.

December 18*th.*—Finished Milner on "Ecclesiastical Architecture in England." He opposes Whittington's opinion, that Gothic architecture originated in the East, and that it attained perfection in France before it did in England. Neither question interests me greatly; what is truly curious and worthy of remark is the progress of the mind in the cultivation of art. All the arts of life are originally the produce of necessity; and it is not till the grosser wants of our nature are supplied that we have leisure to detect a beauty in what was at first only a relief. How each necessary part of a building became an architectural ornament is shown by the theoretical writers on ancient architecture. The same has not yet been done for Gothic architecture; and in this alone the study of modern art is less interesting than that of the ancient. But still it would be highly interesting to inquire how the architecture of the moderns sprang out of the art of the ancients, and how different climates, possibly, and certainly different countries, supplied various elements in the delightful works of the Middle Ages. As to the books I have read, and the different theories in each, I cannot appreciate them, because they appeal to facts with which I am unacquainted, and each disputes the existence of what the others confidently maintain. For instance, the writers are still at variance about what is surely capable of being ascertained, viz.

whether there be any real specimen of the Gothic in Asia.

Flaxman on Wordsworth's Excursion.

December 19th.—Took tea with the Flaxmans, and read to them and Miss Vardel Coleridge's "Christabel," with which they were all delighted, Flaxman more than I expected. I also read some passages out of "The Excursion." Flaxman took umbrage at some mystical expressions in the fragment in the Preface, in which Wordsworth talks of *seeing Jehovah unalarmed. "If my brother had written that," said Flaxman, "I should say, 'Burn it.'" But he admitted that Wordsworth could not mean anything impious in it. Indeed I was unable, and am still, to explain the passage. And Lamb's explanation is unsatisfactory, viz. that there are deeper sufferings in the mind of man than in any imagined hell. If Wordsworth means that all notions about the personality of God, as well as the locality of hell, are but attempts to individualize notions concerning Mind, he will be much more of a metaphysical philosopher nach deutscher Art, than I had any conception of. And yet this otherwise glorious and magnificent fragment tends thitherwards, as far as I can discern any tendency in it.

Lamb.

December 20th.—Late in the evening Lamb called, to sit with me while he smoked his pipe. I had called on him late last night, and he seemed absurdly grateful

* "All strength—all terror, single or in bands,
That ever was put forth in personal form—
Jehovah—with his thunder, and the choir
Of shouting angels, and the empyreal thrones—
I pass them unalarmed."
(Preface to "The Excursion.")

CHAP. XVII. — 1814.

for the visit. He wanted society, being alone. I abstained from inquiring after his sister, and trust he will appreciate the motive.

Miss O'Neil.

December 23rd.—Saw Miss O'Neil in Isabella. She was, as Amyot well said, "a hugging actress." Sensibility shown in grief and fondness was her forte—her only talent. She is praised for her death scenes, but they are the very opposite of Kean's, of which I have spoken. In Kean, you see the ruling passion strong in death—that is, the passion of the individual. Miss O'Neil exhibits the sufferings that are common to all who are in pain. To imitate death closely is disgusting.

The Brentanos.

December 25th.—I called on George Brentano, and was greatly interested by his account of his family, and especially of my former friend, his brother Christian. During the last ten years Christian has been managing the estates of his family in Bohemia, where, says his brother, he has been practising a number of whimsical absurdities. Among other economical projects, he conceived the plan of driving a number of sheep into a barn and forcing them, by flogging, &c., to tread the grain, instead of using a flail. To show that animals might be made to sustain the remedies which art has discovered for human miseries, he broke the legs of some cocks and hens, in order to make them walk with wooden legs.

Of politics George Brentano spoke freely. He is not so warmly anti-Buonapartist as I could have wished, but he is still patriotic. He wishes for a concentration of German power.

December 27th.—Rode to Witham on the outside of the Colchester coach, and amused myself by reading Middleton's "Letter from Rome," a very amusing as well as interesting work. His proof that a great number of the rites and ceremonies of the Romish Church are derived from the Pagan religion is very complete and satisfactory. And he urges his argument against the abuses of the Roman Church with no feelings unfavourable to Christianity. That the earliest Christians voluntarily assimilated the new faith and its rites to the ancient superstition, in order to win souls, and with that accommodating spirit which St. Paul seems to have sanctioned, cannot be doubted. It admits of a doubt how far such a practice is so entirely bad as rigid believers now assert. Certainly these peculiarities are not the most mischievous excrescences which have gradually formed themselves on the surface of the noble and sublimely simple system of Jesus Christ. The worst of these adscititious appendages may be looked upon as bad poetry; but the ineradicable and intolerable vice of Romanism is the infallibility of the Church, and the consequent intolerance of its priests. It is a religion of slavery.

CHAPTER XVIII.

1815.

The Eclectic Review on Wordsworth's Excursion.

January 3rd.—My visit to Witham was made partly that I might have the pleasure of reading "The Excursion" to Mrs. W. Pattisson. The second perusal of this poem has gratified me still more than the first, and my own impressions were not removed by the various criticisms I became acquainted with. I also read to Mrs. Pattisson the Eclectic Review. It is a highly encomiastic article, rendering ample justice to the poetical talents of the author, but raising a doubt as to the religious character of the poem. It is insinuated that Nature is a sort of God throughout, and consistently with the Calvinistic orthodoxy of the reviewer, the lamentable error of representing a love of Nature as a sort of purifying state of mind, and the study of Nature as a sanctifying process is emphatically pointed out.

Mrs. Pattisson further objected that, in Wordsworth, there is a want of sensibility, or rather passion; and she even maintained that one of the reasons why I admire him so much is that I never was in love. We disputed on this head, and it was at last agreed between us that Wordsworth has no power because he has no inclination to describe the passion of an unsuccessful lover, but that he is eminently happy in his description of connubial felicity. We read also the Edinburgh review of the poem. It is a very severe and contemptuous article. Wordsworth is treated as incurable, and the changes are rung on the old keys with great vivacity—affectation, bad taste, mysticism, &c. He is reproached with having written more feebly than before. A ludicrous statement of the story is given, which will not impose on many, for Homer or the Bible might be so represented. But though the attack on Wordsworth will do little mischief among those who are already acquainted with Edinburgh Review articles, it will close up the eyes of many who might otherwise have recovered their sight.

The Edinburgh review of The Excursion.

Perhaps, after all, "The Excursion" will leave Mr. Wordsworth's admirers and contemners where they were. Each will be furnished with instances to strengthen his own persuasions. Certainly I could wish for a somewhat clearer development of the author's opinions, for the retrenchment of some of the uninteresting interlocutory matter, for the exclusion of the tale of the angry, avaricious, and unkind woman, and curtailments in some of the other narratives. But, with these deductions from the worth of the poem, I do not hesitate to place it among the noblest works of the human intellect, and to me it is one of the most delightful. What is good is of the best kind of goodness, and the passages are not few which place the author on a level with Milton. It is true Wordsworth is not an epic poet; but it is also true that what lives in the hearts of readers from the works of Milton is not the epic poem. Milton's story has merit unquestionably; but it is rather a lyric than an epic narrative. Wordsworth is purely and exclusively a lyric poet, in the extended use of that term.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

January 8th.—Called on Mrs. Clarkson (at Bury), and talked with her about "The Excursion." She had received a letter from Wordsworth himself, in which he mentioned the favourable as well as unfavourable opinions he had already heard.

Goethe's Autobiography.

January 21st.—On my ride to London outside the Bury coach I read part of Goethe's Autobiography (3rd vol.) with great pleasure. It is a delightful work, but must be studied, not read as a mere personal history. His account of the "Système de la Nature" and of his theological opinions is peculiarly interesting. All that respects his own life and feelings is delightfully told. It is a book to make a man wish to live, if life were a thing he had not already experienced. There is in Goethe such a zest in living. The pleasures of sense and thought, of imagination and the affections, appear to have been all possessed by him in a more exuberant degree than in any man who has ever renewed his life by writing it. He appears in his youth to have had something even of religious enthusiasm. It would be interesting to know how he lost it, but we shall hardly be gratified by a much longer continuance of this incomparable memoir.

Goethe's zest in living.

Erskine.

January 23rd.—Called on Amyot. He informs me that Lord Erskine is writing a life of C. J. Fox. This work will determine what is at present doubtful—whether Erskine has any literary talent. I shall be gratified if the book does the author and subject credit; for it is lamentable to witness the premature waste of a mind so active as that of the greatest jury-orator. And it has been supposed that since his retreat from the Chancellorship he has devoted himself merely to amusement.*

Anecdotes.

January 26th.—Dined at Mr. Gurney's.† He appeared to advantage surrounded by his family. The conversation consisted chiefly of legal anecdote. Of Graham it was related, that in one case which respected some parish rights, and in which the parish of A. B. was frequently adverted to, he said in his charge, "Gentlemen, there is one circumstance very remarkable in this case, that both the plaintiff's and defendant's counsel have talked a great deal about one A. B., and that neither of them has thought proper to call him as a witness!!" It was Graham who, one day, at the Old Bailey, having omitted to pass sentence of death on a prisoner, and being told that he had forgotten it, exclaimed, very gravely, "Dear me, I beg his pardon, I am sure!" The late Justice Willes was spoken of as having had a habit of interrupting the Counsel; and on such an occasion ——— said to him, "Your Lordship is even a greater man than your father. The Chief Baron used to understand me after I had done, but your Lordship understands me before I begin."

Sharp the engraver.

January 30th.—Dined at the Hall. After dinner went to Flaxman's. He was very chatty and pleasant, and related some curious anecdotes of Sharp the engraver,

* In 1825 Fox's collected speeches were published, with a short biographical and critical introduction by Erskine, six vols.

† Afterwards one of the Barons of the Exchequer.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

who seems the ready dupe of any and every religious fanatic. I have already referred to his notion, that he was about to accompany the Jews under the guidance of Brothers to the Promised Land.* Sharp became a warm partisan of Joanna Southcott, and endeavoured to make a convert of Blake; but, as Flaxman judiciously observed, such men as Blake are not fond of playing second fiddle. Blake lately told Flaxman that he had had a violent dispute with the angels on some subject, and had driven them away. Barry had delusions of another kind. He informed Flaxman that he could not go out of his house on account of the danger he incurred of assassination. And in the lecture room of the Academy he spoke of his house being broken into and robbed, and fixing his eyes on Smirke and other head Academicians, said, "These were not common robbers."

Blake.

Barry.

Serjeant Davy.

February 3rd.—Dined with Walter; Combe and Fraser were there. Combe related an anecdote of Serjeant Davy. The Serjeant was no lawyer, but an excellent Nisi Prius advocate, having great shrewdness and promptitude. On one occasion Lord Mansfield said he should sit on Good Friday, there being a great press of business. It was said no barrister would attend, and in fact no one did; but the Chief Justice tried the causes with the attorneys alone. When the proposal was made to the Bar, Serjeant Davy said to Lord Mansfield, "There has been no precedent since the time of Pontius Pilate."

Jekyll.

I heard the other day of Jekyll the following pun.

* See page 54.

He said, "Erskine used to hesitate very much, and could not speak well after dinner. I dined with him once at the Fishmongers' Company. He made such sad work of speechifying, that I asked him whether it was in honour of the Company that he floundered so."

Thelwall.

February 12th.—Called on Thelwall, whom I had not seen for a long time. Mrs. Thelwall looked ill; he, bating a little hard riding on his hobby, was not unpleasant. He is nearly at the close of his epic poem, which he talked about in 1799, when I visited him in Wales. At least there is no precipitation here. He talked of "The Excursion" as containing finer verses than there are in Milton, and as being in versification most admirable; but then Wordsworth borrows without acknowledgment from Thelwall himself!!

Miss O'Neil.

March 4th.—Dined at Collier's. After dinner took a hasty cup of tea with Anthony Robinson, Junr., and Miss Lamb, and went with them to Covent Garden Theatre to see Miss O'Neil. We sat in the first row, and thus had a near view of her. She did not appear to me a great actress, but still I was much pleased with her. She is very graceful without being very pretty. There is an interesting tenderness and gentleness, the impression of which is, however, disturbed by a voice which I still find harsh. In her unimpassioned acting she pleases from her appearance merely, but in moments of great excitement she wants power. Her sobs in the last act of "The Stranger" were very pathetic, but her general acting in the first scenes was not that of a person habitually melancholy. Young is a mere copy of Kemble throughout in "The Stranger," but certainly a very respectable copy.

Young.

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

Mathews.

After accompanying Miss Lamb to the Temple I returned to see "The Sleep-walker." Mathews's imitations of the actors in his sleep were exceedingly droll; and his burlesque acting as laughable as anything I ever saw or heard in my life, but of course mere farce and buffoonery.

First appearance of Waverley.

February 5th.—Dined with the Colliers. After dinner, Mrs. Collier having lent me "Waverley," I returned to my chambers, and having shut myself within a double door, I took my tea alone and read a great part of the first volume.

The writer has united to the ordinary qualities of works of prose fiction excellences of an unusual kind. The portraits of Baron Bradwardine, a pedantic Highland laird, and of Fergus, a chivalrous rebel, in whom generosity and selfishness, self-devotion and ambition, are so dexterously blended and entangled that we feel, as in real life, unable to disentangle the skein, are very finely executed. The robber, Donald Bean, the assassin, Callum Beg, the Lieutenant, and all the subordinate appendages to a Highland sovereignty, are given in such a manner as to carry with them internal evidence of their genuineness. And the book has passages of great descriptive excellence. The author's sense of the romantic and picturesque in nature is not so delicate, or his execution so powerful, as Mrs. Radcliffe's, but his paintings of men and manners are more valuable. The incidents are not so dexterously contrived, and the author has not produced a very interesting personage in his hero, Waverley, who, as his name was probably intended to indicate, is ever hesitating between two kings and two mistresses. I know not that he meant to symbolize the two princes and the two ladies. Flora, whom Waverley at last leaves, certainly bears with her more of our reverence and admiration than Rose; but we are persuaded that the latter will make her husband happier than he could be with so sublime a personage as her romantic rival. There is more than the usual portion of good sense in this book, which may enjoy, though not immortality, at least a long life.

Buona-parte.

March 14th.—(At Royston.) The news of the day was alarming. Before I left town the intelligence reached us that Buonaparte had entered France, but it was not till to-day that I feared seriously that he might at last succeed in displacing the present Government. Now (I write on the 15th) it appears that he is at Lyons, and one cannot but fear that he has the army with him. If so, the case is dreadful indeed. I fear the French are so imitative a people, that if any one Marshal or considerable corps espouse his cause, all the others will follow.

On the first blow, perhaps, everything depends; for what the French have hitherto most anxiously avoided is civil war. There have not yet been in France two parties sufficiently strong to secure to their partisans the treatment of prisoners of war. The insurgents of La Vendée have always been considered as rebels, and so will be, I think it probable, the adherents of Louis or Buonaparte. If the parties were at all balanced, the interference of the Foreign Powers would at once decide the contest. But, if that interference take place too soon, will it not determine the neutral party to embrace the cause of the ex-Emperor? And yet if there be no interference, will not the army be decidedly on the side of the military chieftain?

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

Hart.

April 8th.—Went to Bury by the coach. Finding Hart was alone inside, I joined him, and never had a more pleasant ride. Hart was very chatty and very agreeable. Of Mr. ——— Hart seems when young to have thought very rightly. Mr. ——— passed then for a great man among good people. Hart said, "When I was a little boy he shocked me by saying to a man who was lamenting his backslidings to him, 'Ah! sir, you must not take these things too much to heart; you must recollect that you were predestined to do them?" A use of the doctrine of Necessity which shocked a sensible child of ten years old.

April 15th.—I called at the Colliers', and finding that Miss Lamb was gone to Alsager's, from whom I had an invitation, I also went. There was a rather large party, and I stayed till near two o'clock, playing whist ill, for which I was scolded by Captain Burney, and debating with Hazlitt, in which I was also unsuccessful, as far as the talent of the disputation was involved, though Hazlitt was wrong, as well as offensive, in almost all he said. When pressed, he does not deny what is bad in the character of Buonaparte. And yet he triumphs and rejoices in the late events. Hazlitt and myself once felt alike on politics. And now our hopes and fears are directly opposed. He retains all his hatred of kings and bad governments, and believing them to be incorrigible, he, from a principle of revenge, rejoices that they are punished. I am indignant to find the man who might have been their punisher become their imitator, and even surpassing them all in guilt. Hazlitt is angry with the friends of liberty for weakening their strength by joining with the common foe against Buonaparte, by which the old governments are so much assisted, even in their attempts against the general liberty. I am not shaken by this consequence, because I think, after all, that, should the governments succeed in the worst projects imputed to them, still the evil will be infinitely less than that which would arise from Buonaparte's success. I say, "Destroy him, at any rate, and take the consequences." Hazlitt says, "Let the enemy of the old tyrannical governments triumph, and I am glad, and do not much care how the new government turns out." Not that I am indifferent to the government which the successful kings of Europe may establish, or that Hazlitt has lost all love for liberty, but that his hatred and my fears predominate and absorb all weaker impressions. This I believe to be the great difference between us.

Hazlitt's Buonapartism.

Wordsworth.

April 16th.—In the evening, in my chambers, enjoyed looking over Wordsworth's new edition of his poems. The supplement to his preface I wish he had left unwritten. His reproaches of the bad taste of the times will be ascribed to merely personal feelings, and to disappointment. But his manly avowal of his sense of his own poetic merit I by no means censure. His preface contains subtle remarks on poetry, but they are not clear; and I wish he would incorporate all his critical ideas into a work of taste, in either the dialogue or novel form; otherwise his valuable suggestions are in danger of being lost. His classification of his poems displeases me from an obvious fault, that it is partly subjective and partly objective.

CH. XVIII.
—
1815.

Burrell.

April 17th.—Spent the forenoon in the Hall, without interest. The Court rose early, and I walked homewards with Burrell. He is a zealous anti-Buonapartist, and on high principles. It is a pleasure to talk with so noble-minded a man. He observed that Buonaparte, if sincere, could not possibly remain a friend to peace. Like Satan, when peace was restored, ease would lead him to recant "vows made in pain, as violent and void." It is contrary to human nature that such a mind could ever rest in tranquillity.

A. Robinson.

April 18th.—Called on Anthony Robinson. He was vehemently abusive of the allies, and angrily strenuous for peace. I had a difficulty in keeping my temper, but when he was spent he listened to me. It seems in fact that, after all, if the question were peace or war with Buonaparte, we must conclude in favour of peace; but the question is, war by us now in France, or by him two years hence in Germany—and then surely the answer must be for war with him now. At the same time the prospect is tremendous, if we are to have war; for how are our resources to endure, which seem now nearly exhausted?

Quayle.

April 22nd.—Mr. Quayle breakfasted with me in the expectation of meeting Tiarks, who called for a moment, but could not stay. Mr. Quayle proposed to me the writing for a new Review, but I gave an indecisive answer. He informs me that Valpy has engaged Tiarks for the Lexicon in consequence of my letter to him. Accompanied Mr. Quayle to Greek Street, and on my return found a letter from my sister announcing that my father had been attacked by apoplexy, and was lying in a state which rendered it unlikely that he would survive many hours. This intelligence could not surprise me, nor, in the state of my father's health, could it grieve me. His faculties were rapidly wasting away, his body enfeebled by disease and age,—he was nearly eighty-eight. He retained his appetite alone of all his sources of pleasure. I rejoiced to hear that his state was that of torpidity, almost of insensibility.

H. C. R's. father.

April 23rd.—I spent the forenoon at home. Mr. Green brought me a letter announcing the expected event; my poor father died between twelve and one o'clock yesterday morning.

He has lived among men a blameless life ; and, perhaps, that he has never excited in his children the best and most delightful emotions has been his misfortune rather than his fault. Oh, how difficult, not to say impossible, to assign the boundaries between natural and moral evil, between the defects of character which proceed from natural imbecility, which no man considers a reproach, and those errors of the will, about which metaphysicians may dispute for ever! Only this I know, that I sincerely wish I was other than I am ; and that I acknowledge among those I see around me individuals whom I believe to be of a nobler and better nature than myself. The want of sensibility in myself I consider as a radical defect in my nature ; but on what does sensibility depend? On constitution, or habits, or what? I cannot tell. I know only that I was not my own maker. I know also that I respect others more than I do myself; though I have hitherto been preserved from doing any act grossly violating the rights of others, and I am yet incapable of a deliberate act of injustice or hard-heartedness. But how long may I be able to say this? How wise and admirable the prayer, "Lead me not into temptation!" I cannot understand the mysteries of religion, but this I am sensible of, that there is a consciousness of good and evil in myself, of strength and weakness, of a goodness out of me which is not in me, and of a something which I can neither attain nor think unattainable. And on this consciousness, common to all men, rests the doctrine of grace and prayer, which I wish to comprehend and duly to feel. I wish to be religious, as an excellence and grace of character, at the least.

Hazlitt on the great novelists.

April 24th.—Spent the greater part of the forenoon at home. Read Hazlitt's article on the great novelists in the Edinburgh Review. A very intelligent article. His discrimination between Fielding and Le Sage is particularly excellent. His characters of Cervantes, Richardson, and Smollett, are also admirable; but his strictures on Sterne are less pointed; and his obtrusive abuse of the politics of the King, as occasioning the decline of novel-writing during the present reign, is very far-fetched indeed. He is also severe and almost contemptuous towards Miss Burney, whose "Wanderer" was the pretence of the article.

May 7th.—On returning from a walk to Shooter's

Hill, I found a card from Wordsworth, and running to Lamb's, I found Mr. and Mrs. Wordsworth there. After sitting half an hour with them, I accompanied them to their lodgings, near Cavendish Square. Mrs. Wordsworth appears to be a mild and amiable woman, not so lively or animated as Miss Wordsworth, but, like her, devoted to the poet.

Mrs. Wordsworth.

May 8th.—I dined with the Colliers, and after dinner called on the Flaxmans. Mrs. Flaxman admitted me to her room. She had about a fortnight before broken her leg, and sprained it besides, by falling downstairs. This misfortune, however, instead of occasioning a repetition of the paralytic stroke, which she had a year ago, seemed to have improved her health. She had actually recovered the use of her hand in some degree, and her friends expect that she will be benefited by the accident. Poor Flaxman, however, had a relapse of his erysipelas, and he is still so weak and nervous that he sees no one. His situation is the worse of the two.

The Flaxmans.

May 9th.—Took tea with the Lambs. Mr. and Mrs. Wordsworth were there. We had a long chat, of which, however, I can relate but little. Wordsworth, in answer to the common reproach that his sensibility is excited by objects which produce no effect on others, admits the fact, and is proud of it. He says that he cannot be accused of being insensible to the real concerns of life. He does not waste his feelings on unworthy objects, for he is alive to the actual interests of society. I think the justification is complete. If Wordsworth expected immediate popularity, he would betray an Wordsworth.

CH. XVIII.
—
1815.

ignorance of public taste impossible in a man of observation.

Alterations in his poems.

He spoke of the changes in his new poems. He has substituted ebullient for fiery, speaking of the nightingale, and jocund for laughing, applied to the daffodils; but he will probably restore the original epithets. We agreed in preferring the original reading. But on my alluding to the lines,—

"Three feet long and two feet wide," and confessing that I dared not read them aloud in company, he said, "They ought to be liked."

Yew Trees.

Wordsworth particularly recommended to me, among his Poems of Imagination, "Yew Trees," and a description of Night. These he says are among the best for the imaginative power displayed in them. I have since read them. They are fine, but I believe I do not understand in what their excellence consists. The poet himself, as Hazlitt has well observed, has a pride in deriving no aid from his subject. It is the mere power which he is conscious of exerting in which he delights, not the production of a work in which men rejoice on account of the sympathies and sensibilities it excites in them. Hence he does not much esteem his "Laodamia," as it belongs to the inferior class of poems founded on the affections. In this, as in other peculiarities of Wordsworth, there is a German bent in his mind.

Miss O'Neil.

May 20th.—Went to Covent Garden to see "Venice Preserved." Miss O'Neil's Belvidera was our only attraction, and it proved our gratification. In spite of her untragical face, she strongly affected us by mere sweetness and grace. Her scenes of tenderness are very pleasing, and, contrary to my expectation, she produced a great effect in the last scenes of strong passion. She threw her whole feeling into her acting, and by this abandon, as it were, she wrought wonders—that is, for her—considering that nature has denied her powers for the higher characters.

Evening at Lamb's.

May 23rd.—Between five and six I was at Islington during a long shower. I waited till I despaired of better weather, and then returned to town. Just as I reached the Temple, wetted to the skin, the rain subsided, and the evening became very fine. However, I could hardly repent of my impatience, for I went to Lamb's, and took tea with Wordsworth there. Alsager,* Barron Field, Talfourd, the Colliers, &c., stepped in late. Wordsworth was very chatty on poetry. I had some business to attend to, which rendered me restless, so I left at eleven. Miss Hutchinson was of the party; she improves greatly on acquaintance. She is a lively, sensible little woman.

Kean's Richard II.

May 25th.—After dining with the Colliers, I accompanied Miss Lamb to the theatre, where we were joined by the Wordsworths. We had front places at Drury Lane and saw "Richard II." It is a heavy and uninteresting play; principally because the process by which Richard is deposed is hardly perceived. Kean's acting in the first three acts has in it nothing worth

* Alsager had, at one time, a manufactory and a bleaching-ground near the King's Bench Prison; but he gave this up, and, being a great lover of music, recommended himself to the Times as an amateur reporter on musical matters. He became City Correspondent, and wrote the "State of the Money Market" for many years. He was also a shareholder in the paper till he had a serious misunderstanding with Walter.

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

notice; but in the fourth and fifth acts he certainly exhibits the weak, passionate, and eloquent monarch to great advantage. In the scene in which he gives up the crown, the conflict of passion is finely kept up; and the blending of opposite emotions is so curious as to resemble incipient insanity. Several admirable artifices of the actor gave great satisfaction—one in particular, in which he derides Bolingbroke for affecting to kneel, and intimates by a sign with his hand that Bolingbroke aims at the level of his crown.

Wordsworth.

May 28th.—I dined at Collier's with a party assembled to see Wordsworth. There were Young, Barnes, Alsager, &c. The afternoon passed off pleasantly, but the conversation was not highly interesting. Wordsworth was led to give an opinion of Lord Byron which flattered me by its resemblance to my own. He reproached the author with the contradiction in the character of the Corsair, &c. He also blamed Crabbe for his unpoetical mode of considering human nature and society.

I left the party to inquire concerning the Anthony Robinsons, and on my return found the Wordsworths gone; but I went to Lamb's, where they came, and I enjoyed their company till very late. I began to feel quite cordial with Mrs. Wordsworth. She is an amiable woman.

White Doe of Rylstone.

June 4th.—Mr. Nash, Senr., and my brother Thomas breakfasted with me. I conducted Mr. Nash to Mr. Belsham's meeting, and came home to read "The White Doe of Rylstone," by Wordsworth. This legendary tale will be less popular than Walter Scott's, from the want of that vulgar intelligibility, and that freshness and vivacity of description, which please even those who are not of the vulgar. Still, the poem will be better liked than better pieces of Wordsworth's writing. There are a delicate sensibility and exquisite moral running through the whole; but it is not the happiest of his narrative poems.

Dinner at Porden's.

June 5th.—Dined at Mr. Porden's. Sir James Smith of Norwich, the botanical professor, there, also Phillips* the painter, and Taylor, the editor or proprietor of the Sun.† I spent a pleasant afternoon. Sir James is a very well-bred man, and though his conversation was not piquant, amenity supplied an equal charm; though that word is not applicable to the correct propriety and rather dry courtesy of the Unitarian professor. Phillips was very agreeable, but the hero of the day was Taylor—"everybody's Taylor," as he is sometimes designated. He has lively parts, puns, jokes, and is very good-natured. The Flaxmans were not there. Mrs. Flaxman is gone to Blackheath. Miss Porden, in a feeling manner, spoke of her apprehension that the Flaxman family is broken up as a happy and social circle. Mrs. Flaxman's health is very precarious, and her husband is dependent on her, and suffers himself through her complaint. This, I fear, is a fact; and it is a melancholy subject. These breakings-up of society are mournful at all times, and peculiarly so when they befall the very best of persons.

* Thomas Phillips, R.A., painted all the leading characters of the day. He was a peculiarly refined artist, but scarcely ever exceeded the sphere of portrait painting. Coleridge, Southey, Byron, Crabbe, Chantrey, Blake, Sir Joseph Banks, Lord Brougham, Faraday, and Walter Scott sat to him. His lectures on Painting and contributions to Rees's Cyclopædia show extensive learning and originality of thought. He was born at Dudley, in Warwickshire, 1770, and died in George Street, Hanover Square, 1845.

† John Taylor, son of a celebrated oculist in Hatton Garden, born 1752. Was oculist to George III. and William IV. He published "The Records of my Life," various Poems, and "Monsieur Tonson." Died 1832.

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

Dinner at Amyot's.

June 6th.—I dined with Amyot. A small party were there, consisting of Sharon Turner, the historian and antiquarian; Charles Marsh,* ex-barrister and M.P.; William Taylor of Norwich; and Penn, a clerk in one of the public offices, a descendant of William Penn. Charles Marsh stayed with us but a short time; he was sent for to the House of Commons. His manners are easy and gentlemanly; he said little, but he spoke with great vivacity. Sharon Turner is a good converser, but with a little pedantry. He spoke of Martin Burney handsomely, but oddly. He said, "I always thought he would flower, though it might be late. He is a man of great honour and integrity. He never told me a lie in his life!"

William Taylor was amusing, as usual. He gravely assured me that he believes the allies will succeed in penetrating into France; that the French will then offer the crown to the Emperor Alexander, who will accept it; and then the allies will fight against Alexander, to prevent the union of the two crowns. William Taylor enjoys nothing so much as an extravagant speculation—the odder the better. He spoke of Wordsworth—praised his conversation, which he likes better than his poetry—says he is solid, dignified, eloquent, and simple. "But he looked surprised," said Taylor, "when I told

* See ante, p. 42.

Ch. xviii.
—
1815.

him that I considered Southey the greatest poet and the greatest historian living."—"No great matter of surprise," I answered, "that Wordsworth should think himself a greater poet than Southey."

Wordsworth.

June 15th.—I allowed myself a holiday to-day. Mord Andrews breakfasted with me. Afterwards I called on Wordsworth at his lodgings. He was luckily at home, and I spent the forenoon with him, walking. We talked about Hazlitt, in consequence of a malignant attack on Wordsworth by him in Sunday's *Examiner. Wordsworth that very day called on Hunt, who in a manly way asked him whether he had seen the paper of the morning; saying, if he had, he should consider his call as a higher honour. He disclaimed the article. The attack by Hazlitt was a note, in which, after honouring Milton for being a consistent patriot, he sneered at Wordsworth as the author of "paltry sonnets upon the Royal fortitude," &c., and insinuated that he had left out the "Female Vagrant," a poem describing the miseries of war sustained by the poor.

Party at Lamb's.

June 17th.—I went late to Lamb's. His party were there, and a numerous and odd set they were—for the greater part interesting and amusing people—George Dyer, Captain and Martin Burney, Ayrton, Phillips,

* The attack referred to is contained in the following remarks on Milton, in the Examiner, for 11th June, 1815:—"Whether he was a true patriot we shall not inquire; he was at least a consistent one. He did not retract his defence of the people of England; he did not say that his sonnets to Vane or Cromwell were meant ironically; he was not appointed Poet Laureate to a Court he had reviled and insulted; he accepted neither place nor pension; nor did he write paltry sonnets upon the 'Royal fortitude' of the House of Stuart, by which, however, they really lost something." To these words a footnote is appended referring to a sonnet to the King, "in the Last Edition of the Works of a modern Poet."

CH. XVIII.
—
1815.

Hazlitt and wife, Alsager, Barron Field, Coulson, John Collier, Talfourd, White, Lloyd, and Basil Montagu. The latter I had never before been in company with; his feeling face and gentle tones are very interesting. Wordsworth says of him that he is a "philanthropized courtier." He gave me an account of his first going the Norfolk Circuit. He walked the circuit generally, and kept aloof from the Bar; in this way he contrived to pay his expenses. He began at Huntingdon, where he had a half-guinea motion; and as he was then staying at his brother's house, he walked to Bury with that money in his pocket, picked up a fee there, and so went on. Mackintosh was the immediate senior of Montagu, and assisted in bringing him forward. Mackintosh had business immediately as a leader, and after a short time the two travelled together. But during some time Montagu lived on bread and cheese. He is a strenuous advocate for all reforms in the law, and believes that in time they will all take place.

The Wordsworths.

June 18th.—Breakfasted at Wordsworth's. Wordsworth was not at home, but I stayed chatting with the ladies till he returned; and several persons dropping in, I was kept there till two o'clock, and was much amused.

John Scott.

Scott, editor of the Champion,* and Haydon the painter† stayed a considerable time. Scott is a little

* John Scott, editor of the Champion, and afterwards of the London Magazine, an intimate friend of Haydon the artist. He was killed in a duel with Mr. Christie, in 1821, which arose from a misunderstanding with Mr. Lockhart.—See the "Annual Register" for 1823.

† This powerful, but seldom judicious, artist, obtained considerable distinction as a young man, by his independence of spirit and by determined swarthy man. He talked fluently on French politics, and informed me that he has learnt from good authority that La Fayette was applied to by the King on Buonaparte's reappearance in France; that La Fayette said he wished the King success, and would serve under him on conditions which he gave in writing; that the King refused to accede to them, and La Fayette retired to his estate. On Buonaparte's arrival he, too, sent for La Fayette, who refused to serve under him or accept a place among the peers, but said that, if elected, he would become a member of the legislative body.

Haydon.

Haydon has an animated countenance, but did not say much. Both he and Scott seemed to entertain a high reverence for the poet.

Godwin's opinion on the war.

June 22nd.—I spent the evening by appointment with Godwin. The Taylors were there. We talked politics, and not very comfortably. Godwin and I all but quarrelled; both were a little angry, and equally offensive to each other. Godwin was quite impassioned in asserting his hope that Buonaparte may be successful in the war. He declares his wish that all the allies that enter France now may perish, and affirmed that no man who did not abandon all moral principles and love of liberty could wish otherwise. I admitted that, in opposition to the weak and blind imitation of academic traditions in painting. He viewed the Elgin Marbles with rapture, and contributed much to secure a proper estimation of the works of Phidias, and the great Athenian sculptors in this country. His own performances were not equally successful. His "Raising of Lazarus," the best example of his merits and defects, has been recently purchased for the National Gallery. He was born at Plymouth, 1786, and died by his own hand in Burwood Place, London, 1846. His lectures are learned and practical. His eloquence is vehement. His autobiography, edited by Tom Taylor, was published in three volumes, 1853.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

general, foreigners have no right to interfere in the government of a country, but, in this case, I consider the foreign armies as coming to the relief of the people against the oppressions of domestic soldiers; and in this lies the justice of the war. Richard Taylor* maintained that nothing could justify the invasion of a country. I treated it as mere formalism and pedantry to ask where is the battle fought. In the spirit of the idea the invaders may be, as is now the fact, carrying on a purely defensive war. And the moral certainty that Buonaparte would have made war as soon as it became convenient, justifies the allies in beginning. Godwin considered the acting on such a surmise unjustifiable. I asserted that all the actions of life proceed on surmises. We, however, agreed in apprehending that Buonaparte may destroy the rising liberties of the French, and that the allies may attempt to force the old Bourbon despotism on the French. But Godwin thinks the latter, and I the former, to be the greater calamity. I also consider the future despotism of Buonaparte a certain consequence of his success in the campaign; and, besides, I believe that even if the French be so far beaten as to be obliged to take back Louis on terms, yet they will still remain so formidable that the allies will not dare to impose humiliating conditions; so that the French may at last be led to offer the Crown again on terms of their own imposing. Richard Taylor would be satisfied with this, but Godwin would on no account have the allies successful.

I am no longer very anxious for the liberties of the

* The printer.

French. It is infinitely more important for Europe that their national spirit of foreign conquest should be crushed, than that their civil liberties should be preserved. Like the Romans, they may be the conquerors of all other nations, even while they are maintaining their own liberties. And I no longer imagine, as I once did, that it is only monarchs and governments which can be unjust and love war.

Battle of Waterloo.

June 23rd.—I went to the Surrey Institution to read the detailed account of the glorious victory at Waterloo. This is indeed most glorious; but still I fear it will not so affect the French people as to occasion a material defalcation from Buonaparte. And if he be, after all, supported by the French, numerous and bloody must be the victories which are to overthrow him.

After nine o'clock I walked to Ayrton's. The illuminations were but dull, and there were scarcely any marks of public zeal or sympathy. I stayed at Ayrton's till half-past one. Lamb, Alsager, &c., were there, but it was merely a card-party.

Thelwall.

June 30th.—Called on Thelwall. He was in unaffected low spirits. Godwin, Lofft, and Thelwall are the only three persons I know (except Hazlitt) who grieve at the late events. Their intentions and motives are respectable, and their sorrow proceeds from mistaken theory, and an inveterate hatred of old names. They anticipate a revival of ancient despotism in France; and they will not acknowledge the radical vices of the French people, by which the peace of Europe is more endangered than the liberties of the French are by the restoration of the Bourbons.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

Long.

July 2nd.—I spent the forenoon at home, except that Long* and I lounged with Wordsworth's poems in the Temple Gardens. Long had taken the sacrament at Belsham's, for which I felt additional respect towards him. Though I am not religious myself, I have great respect for a conduct which proceeds from a sense of duty, and is under the influence of religious feelings. I greatly esteem Long in all respects, both for his understanding and his moral feelings, which together comprise nearly all that is valuable in man.

Thelwall.

July 4th.—At half-past four I went to Thelwall's, to witness a singular display. Thelwall exhibited several of his young people, and also himself, in the presence of the Abbé Sicard, and several of his deaf and dumb pupils. Thelwall delivered a lecture to about sixty or seventy persons. He gave an account of his plan of curing impediments in the speech. He makes his pupils read verse—beating time. And I have no doubt that the effect is produced by the facility of repeating a movement once begun, and partly by the effect of imagination. The attention is fixed and directed by the movement and time-beating. This simple fact, or phenomenon, Thelwall has not distinctly perceived or comprehended. His boys read, or rather recited, verse very pleasantly, and without stammering, so as to produce an effect far more favourable to his system than his own explanation of it. After this two hours' display we dined, and in the evening Sicard's pupils afforded amusement in the drawing-room by the correspondence they carried on with the ladies. One of them wrote

Sicard and his deaf and dumb pupils.

* George Long, the barrister, and afterwards police magistrate.

notes to Mrs. Rough, and gave a gallant turn to all he wrote, for even the deaf and dumb retain their national character. I wrote some ridiculous question in Mrs. Rough's name. She wrote to him that I was an advocate, and therefore not to be believed. He answered, "I am glad to hear it, as he can defend me if I have the misfortune to offend you."

Paris taken.

July 7th.—I called on Amyot early, and found on going out that Paris had been again taken by the allies. But the public did not rejoice, for Paris had capitulated on honourable terms, and Buonaparte had escaped. During the day Mr. Whitbread's death was more a subject of interest than the possession of Paris. The death of so watchful a member of Parliament is really a national loss. He belonged to the noblest class of mankind.

Whitbread's death.

Miss O'Neil.

In the evening joined Amyot and his family, in the front dress-boxes of Covent Garden. Miss O'Neil's Jane Shore, I think, delighted me more than any character I have seen her play. Her expression of disgust and horror when she meets with her husband, as well as her general acting in that scene, are as fine as can be conceived, coming from so uninteresting a face. What a treasure were Mrs. Siddons now as young as Miss O'Neil!

At Norwich.

July 29th.—(At Norwich, on circuit.) This day was devoted to amusement, and accordingly passed away heavily. I called after breakfast on Millard, and then went to Amyot, with whom I spent the remainder of the day. He introduced me to Dr. Bathurst, Bishop of Norwich. The bishop's manners are very pleasing.

Bishop Bathurst.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

His attentions to me would have been flattering, could I have thought them distinguishing, but probably they proceed from a habit of courtesy. I had scarcely exchanged ten words with him when, speaking of ancient times in reference to the former splendour of the buildings attached to the Palace, he said, "Ah! Mr. Robinson, bishops had then more power than you or I wish them to have," as if he knew I was born a Nonconformist. I afterwards met him in the gardens, where a balloon was to ascend; he was arm-in-arm with a Roman Catholic, and on my going up to him he took hold of me also, and remained with us a considerable time walking about. On my uttering some jest about bishops in partibus, he eulogized the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland as eminently apostolic. The bishop's manners are gentle, and his air is very benignant. He is more gentlemanly than Grégoire, and more sincere than Hohenfels.

Tour in Belgium and Holland.

Continental tour.

*Rem.—The Battle of Waterloo having taken place in June, I was determined to make a tour in Belgium, to which I was also urged by my friend Thomas Naylor,† who was my travelling companion from Sunday, August 6th, to Saturday, September 2nd.

* Written in 1850.

† Father of Samuel Naylor, the translator of "Reineke Fuchs," and son of Samuel Naylor, of Great Newport Street, agent to Mr. Francis, in whose office Mr. Robinson was an articled clerk. H. C. R. says, "S. Naylor, Senr., took me to the first play I ever saw in London; it was 'Peeping Tom of Coventry.' I have forgotten all about it, excepting that I was troubled by the number of people on the stage, and that I saw and admired Jack Bannister."

I kept a journal of this tour, and have just finished a hasty perusal of it. It contains merely an account of what occurred to myself, and the incidents were so unimpressive that the narrative has brought to my recollection very few persons and very few places. I shall, therefore, not be tempted to dwell upon the events.

Travelling companion.

Naylor and I went to Margate on the 6th, and next day, after visiting Ramsgate, embarked in a small and unpromising vessel, which brought us to Ostend early on the following morning. There were on board four young men, who, like ourselves, were bound for Waterloo. We agreed to travel together, and I, being the only one who understood any language but English, was elected governor; most of us remained together till the end of the journey. I have lost sight of them all, but I will give their names. There was a young Scotch M.D., named Stewart, whom I afterwards met in London, when he told me the history of his good fortune. It was when travelling in France, after our rencontre, that he by accident came to a country inn, where he found a family in great alarm. An English lady was taken in premature labour. The case was perilous. No medical man was there. He offered his services, and continued to attend her until her husband, a General, and personal friend of the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Wellington, arrived. The General acknowledged him to be the saviour of his wife's life, and in return obtained for him a profitable place on the medical staff of the English army.

Stewart.

The other young men were Barnes, a surgeon, and

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

two merchants or merchants' clerks, Watkins and Williams.

Places visited.

Our journey lay through Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, Antwerp, Breda, Utrecht, Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leyden, the Hague, Delft, Rotterdam, and the Briel, to Helvoetsluys, and from thence to Harwich.

Canal voyage.

No small part of the tour was in barges. One in particular I enjoyed. It was the voyage from Bruges to Ghent, during which I certainly had more pleasure than I had ever before had on board a vessel, and with no alloy whatever. This canal voyage is considered one of the best in the Netherlands, and our boat, though not superbly furnished, possessed every convenience. We took our passage in the state-cabin, over which was an elegant awning. I found I could write on board with perfect ease; but from time to time I looked out of the cabin-window on a prospect pleasingly diversified by neat and comfortable houses on the banks. The barge proceeded so slowly that we could hardly perceive when it stopped. A man was walking on the side of the canal for a great part of the way, and I therefore suppose our pace was not much more than four miles an hour.

We embarked at half-past ten, and at two o'clock an excellent dinner was served up, consisting of fish, flesh, and fowl, with rich pastry, and plenty of fruit. For this dinner, and the voyage of between thirty and forty miles, we paid each 5fr.

Field of Waterloo.

The main object of the tour was to visit the field of the recent great Battle of Waterloo. It was on the 14th of August when we inspected the several points famous in the history of this battle. Not all the vestiges of the conflict were removed. There were arms of trees hanging down, shattered by cannon-balls, and not yet cut off. And there were ruined and burnt cottages in many places, and marks of bullets and balls on both houses and trees ; but I saw nothing in particular to impress me, except that in an inn near the field I had a glimpse of a lady in weeds, who was come on a vain search after the body of her husband, slain there. A more uninteresting country, or one more fit for "a glorious victory," being flat and almost without trees, than that round Waterloo, cannot be imagined. I saw it some years afterwards, when ugly monuments were erected there, and I can bear witness to the fact of the great resemblance which the aspect of the neighbourhood of Waterloo bears to a village a mile from Cambridge, on the Bury road.

Relics.

On the field and at other places the peasants brought us relics of the fight. Dr. Stewart purchased a brass cuirass for a napoleon, and pistols &c. were sold to others. For my own part, with no great portion of sentimental feeling, I could have wished myself to pick up some memorial; but a mere purchase was not sufficient to satisfy me.

We dined at Waterloo. Our host was honest, for on my ordering a dinner at 2fr. a head, he said he never made two prices, and should charge only 1½fr. In the village, which is naked and wretched, a festival was being held in honour of the patron saint ; but we were told that, in consequence of the battle, and out of respect to brave men who lay there, there was to be no dancing this year.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

In the circular brick church of Waterloo we saw two plain marble monuments, bearing simply the names of the officers of the 1st Foot Guards and 15th King's Hussars who had fallen there. Even the reward of being so named is given but to one in a thousand. Sixty thousand men are said to have been killed or wounded at Waterloo. Will sixty be named hereafter?

Churches.

In general I admired the towns of Belgium, but Ghent was my favourite. The fine architecture of the Catholic churches of the Netherlands gratified me, while I was disgusted with the nakedness and meanness of the Protestant churches of Holland.

Broek.

Among the few objects which have left any traces in my memory, the one which impressed me most was the secluded village of Broek, near Amsterdam. My journal for the 21st of August contains the account of our visit to this village and that of Saardam. The people of Broek live in a state of proud seclusion from the rest of mankind, and, being industrious, are able to banish the appearance of poverty, at least from their cottages. We walked for about an hour through the narrow streets, which are moated on a small scale. There were a great number of inferior houses, but not a single poor one—all were adorned more or less. Most of them are painted white and green—some entirely green. In general the blinds were closed, so that we could scarcely get a peep into any of them. When we did look in we observed great neatness and simplicity, with marks of affluence at the same time. The shops had a few goods in the windows as a sort of symbol, but were as secluded as the private houses.

Scarcely an individual did we see in the streets. We met one woman with a flat piece of gold or gilt metal on the forehead, and a similar piece behind: she wore also long gold earrings. This, however, is not an unusual costume for the affluent peasantry elsewhere. We pulled off our hats to the Broek belle, but had no salutation in return. The general seclusion of the village, from which nothing could be seen but meadows with ditches, the silence of the streets, the perfect stillness and neatness of the objects, every dwelling resembling a summer-house rather than an ordinary residence, the cheerful and unusual colours, and the absence of all the objects which denote a hard-working race of men, gave to the whole place an air absolutely Arcadian. The only objects which disturbed this impression were several houses of a better description, with large windows, gilded shutters, carved frontispieces, and the other ornaments of a fashionable house. One in particular had a porch with Corinthian pillars, and a large garden with high, clipped trees. One surgeon's house had an announcement that wine and strong liquors were to be had—as if these were still, in this Dutch Arcadia, articles of medicine only. It is said that there is no public-house in Broek. We saw one, but did not go in. It did not look like the rest of the houses.

Saarlem.

We were next driven to Saardam, where we visited the hut which alone brings many an idle traveller to the place, and in which Peter of Russia resided while he learnt the trade of ship-building, performing the work of

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

Peter the Great.

a common ship-wright. It is certainly right to perpetuate the memory of an act in which an admirable sentiment prevailed, whatever want of good sense and judgment there might be in it. The hut has nothing particular about it, except that it is worse than the other huts, it being of course a principle to keep it in its original condition. While in this singular village we saw a school in which the children were singing to the tune of "God save the King." This is become the general tune throughout Europe for the partisans of legal and restored monarchs, though originally written in honour of an elected sovereign house.

This belongs to the agreeable days of my tour. I had seen life in a new shape—one of the varieties of human existence with which it is, or rather may be, useful to become acquainted. Yet I ought to add that I saw little of these North Hollanders, and cannot tell what their manners and morals may be. There is certainly no virtue in selfish seclusion from the world.

The value of seclusion discussed.

The neighbourhood of such a city as Amsterdam must supply opportunities for the vices which will spring up in any soil. Yet, certainly, in the insulated and clannish spirit which prevails in these villages there is generated a benevolence, or extension of selfishness beyond the individual, which may protect the members of the clan and inhabitants of the island from the severest evils of life. So that, though perhaps these peasants are not especial objects of love or admiration, yet they may be envied by those who have witnessed, if not experienced, the heavier calamities so frequently arising in the more polished and more highly civilized circles of life elsewhere.

Organ at Haarlem.

At Haarlem I heard the celebrated organ in the great church. I am half afraid to say in writing how much I was gratified. I have been in the habit of saying and believing that I have no ear for music, and certainly I have suffered ennui at listening to some which others thought very fine, but to this I listened with delight, and was quite sorry when it ceased.

Amsterdam, &c.

I was amused with the gorgeous show in the Greek church at Amsterdam. I was pleased with the Hague, and with the Royal Palace called the House in the Wood. I was struck also with the Bies Bosch, the melancholy memorial of a frightful inundation near Dort, which took place in the fifteenth century.

On the church tower of Utrecht I fell in with the Masqueriers, with whom was Walton, an attorney. With him I afterwards became acquainted. I returned to England on the 2nd of September.

Religious belief.

September 22nd.—At the end of a visit to my friends Mr. and Mrs. W. Pattisson, at Witham, I went to take leave of Mrs. Pattisson, Senr. She began interrogating me about my religious opinions. This she did in a way so kind and benevolent that I could not be displeased, or consider her impertinent. I was unable to answer her as I could wish. However, I did not scruple to declare to her that such orthodoxy as Mr. N——'s would deter me from Christianity. I cannot wish to have a belief which excludes from salvation such persons as my own dear mother, my uncle Crabb, and a large portion of the best people I have ever known.

At Bagshot.

October 4th.—(On a visit to my brother Habakkuk at

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

Bagshot.) After dining tête-à-tête with my niece Elizabeth, and playing backgammon with her, we called on Mrs. Kitchener and took tea with her. Mrs. Cooper (the widow of the former clergyman at Bagshot), who was there, related to me some singular circumstances about the state of her husband's mind in his last illness. He was then more than eighty years of age. He imagined himself to be dead, and gave directions as for the burial of a dead man; and he remained in this persuasion for several weeks. At one time he desired a note to be sent to the Duke of Gloucester announcing his death. At another time he desired that the mourners might be well provided for, and inquired about the preparations made. In particular, on one occasion when a clean shirt was being put on, he reminded the servants that, being a corpse, they must put on nothing but woollen, or they would incur a penalty. When told that, if dead, he could not talk about it, he for a moment perceived the absurdity of his notion, but soon relapsed.

Hypochondria.

Curious hallucination.

Flaxman.

October 26th.—At work in my chambers in the forenoon. After dining at Collier's I went to Flaxman's. I had not seen him for many months, and was glad to find all the family well, Mrs. Flaxman in particular recovered. We chatted about my journey to Holland. Flaxman speaks with contempt of Dutch statuary. He rejoices in the restoration of the works of art to Iatly.*

* When, in 1815, the allied sovereigns arrived in Paris, they insisted upon the restoration of the objects of art which had been pillaged from various places by the orders of Napoleon. "A memorial from all the artists of Europe at Rome, claimed for the Eternal City the entire restoration of the immortal

November 5th.—(At Royston on a visit to Mr. Wedd.) We dined late. W. Nash and T. Nash of Whittlesford with us. The afternoon spent agreeably. In the evening Mr. Nash came to us. He was in good spirits. The cheerful benignity of the old gentleman renders him delightful, but age is advancing rapidly on him, and his faculties are growing blind with years. He is, however, with all his infirmities, the model of a venerable old man. It is a felicity to live within the influence of such a character, who creates a society by his personal virtues.

CH. XVIII. 1815. Royston. Mr. Nash.

November 11th.—Went to see the play of "Percy," by Hannah More. It is much like "Gabrielle de Vergy." The situation is highly interesting. A chaste and noble-minded woman having been forced to marry a man she hates, the rival, whom she loves, suddenly returns, ignorant of her marriage. The husband furiously jealous and cruel, &c. &c. Of course they all die, as in "Gabrielle." Miss O'Neil gave great interest to the play during the first three acts. Her tenderness is exquisite, and her expression of disgust and horror, while she averts her countenance and hides it with her hands, is peculiarly masterly. This single expression she has elaborately studied. Young played the jealous husband with spirit, but Charles Kemble was a mere ranting lover as Percy. He ought not to have given the name to the play.

Miss O'Neil.

November 12th.—Continued reading Wraxall. A re-

Repartee of Burke's.

works of art which had once adorned it. The allied sovereigns acceded to the just demand; and Canova, impassioned for the arts, and the city of his choice, hastened to Paris to superintend the removal. It was most effectually done."—ALISON'S Europe, Vol. XII., 286, 9th edition.

CH. XVIII. — 1815.

partee of Burke's pleased me. David Hartley, Member for Hull, was the dullest of speakers in the House of Commons. Having spoken so long as to drive away the greater number of the members (more than 300 having dwindled down to 80), he moved that the Riot Act should be read at the table, on which Burke, who sat next him, exclaimed, "My dear friend! why, in God's name, read the Riot Act? Do not you see that the mob are dispersed already?"*

C. Lamb.

November 14th.—Dined at the Hall. After nine I called on Charles Lamb. He was much better in health and spirits than when I saw him last. Though tête-à-tête, he was able to pun. I was speaking of my first brief, when he asked, "Did you not exclaim,— Thou great first cause, least understood"?

Tamerlane.

November 22nd.—Accompanied Miss Nash to the theatre, and saw "Tamerlane," a very dull play. It is more stuffed with trite declamation, and that of an inferior kind, than any piece I recollect. It is a compendium of political commonplaces. And the piece is not the more valuable because the doctrines are very wholesome and satisfactory. Tamerlane is a sort of regal Sir Charles Grandison—a perfect king, very wise and insipid. He was not unfitly represented by Pope, if the character be intended merely as a foil to that of the ferocious Bajazet. Kean performed that character throughout under the idea of his being a two-legged beast. He rushed on the stage at his first appearance as a wild beast may be supposed to enter a new den to which his keepers have transferred him. His tartan whiskers improved the natural excellence of his face; his projecting under-lip and admirably expressive eye gave to his countenance all desirable vigour; and his exhibition of rage and hatred was very excellent. But there was no relief as there would have been had the bursts of feeling been only occasional. In the happy representation of one passion Kean afforded me great pleasure; but this was all I enjoyed.

* "Historical Memoirs of my Own Time," by Sir N. W. Wraxall. Vol. II. p. 377.

C. Lamb.

November 24th.—I called on Lamb, and chatted an hour with him. Talfourd stepped in, and we had a pleasant conversation. Lamb has a very exclusive taste, and spoke with equal contempt of Voltaire's Tales and "Gil Blas." He may be right in thinking the latter belongs to a low class of compositions, but he ought not to deny that it has excellence of its kind.

Illuminations for Peace.

November 27th.—I dined at Collier's, and somewhat late went to Mrs. Joddrel's. There was an illumination to-night for the Peace, but it did not occur to me to look at a single public building, and I believe no one cared about it. A duller rejoicing could not be conceived. There was hardly a crowd in the streets.

Landseer.

December 5th.—Went to the Surrey Institution in the evening, and heard a lecture on the Philosophy of Art, by Landseer.* He is animated in his style, but his animation is produced by indulgence in sarcasms,

* John Landseer, an engraver of considerable talent, and father of the present Sir Edwin Landseer. He was born at Lincoln, 1769. In his later years the pen superseded the burin. He delivered a course of lectures on engraving at the Royal Institution in 1806; his best known literary works are "Sabæan Researches" and a "Descriptive Catalogue of Pictures in the National Gallery." His best engraving is from his son's well-known picture "The Dogs of St. Bernard." He died in February, 1852.

Ch. xviii. — 1815.

and in emphatic diction. He pronounces his words in italics; and by colouring strongly he produces an effect easily.

A bed on a parish boundary.

December 7th.—I spent several hours at the Clerkenwell Sessions. A case came before the court ludicrous from the minuteness required in the examination. Was the pauper settled in parish A or B? The house he occupied was in both parishes, and models both of the house and the bed in which the pauper slept were laid before the court, that it might ascertain how much of his body lay in each parish. The court held the pauper to be settled where his head (being the nobler part) lay, though one of his legs at least, and great part of his body, lay out of that parish. Quod notandum est!

Party at Alsager's.

December 9th.—I read term reports in the forenoon, and after dining with the Colliers returned to my chambers till seven, when I went to Alsager's. There I met the Lambs, Hazlitt, Burrell, Ayrton, Coulson, Sleigh, &c. I enjoyed the evening, though I lost at cards, as I have uniformly done. Hazlitt was sober, argumentative, acute, and interesting. I did not converse with him, but enjoyed his conversation with others. Lamb was good-humoured and droll, with great originality, as usual. Coulson was a new man almost to me. He is said to be a prodigy of knowledge—a young élève of Jeremy Bentham—a reporter for The Chronicle.

Kean in the Beggar's Bush.

December 19th.—Spent the morning at Guildhall agreeably. After dining at the Colliers', I took a hasty cup of tea with Naylor, and was followed by him to Drury Lane Theatre. We saw Beaumont and Fletcher's play of "The Beggar's Bush." For the first time I saw Kean without any pleasure whatever. He has no personal dignity to supply the want of dress. No one suspects the Prince in the Merchant, and even as the Merchant he has not an air of munificence. He inspires no respect whatever; and he has no opportunity for the display of his peculiar excellence—bursts of passion. The beggar-scenes and the loyal burgomaster of Bruges are very pleasant. "Who's Who?" a farce by Poole, has an amusing scene or two. Munden as a knavish Apothecary's shopman, and Harley as the Apothecary, are very comic. By-the-by, Harley is a young and promising actor.

Who's Who?

December 23rd.—I read several chapters of Paley's "Evidences of Christianity," having resolved to read attentively and seriously that and other works on a subject transcendently important, and which I am ashamed thus long to have delayed studying. I dined with the Colliers and spent some time at home, taking tea alone. I called on Long, and had a short chat with him. The lively pleasure he expressed at my informing him of the books I intended to study quite gratified me. He is a most excellent creature. I look up to him with admiration the more I see of him.

Reading Paley.

December 27th.—Spent the morning at home reading industriously law reports. I dined with Collier, and having read again in my room, I went after six o'clock to Thelwall's, and was present at an exhibition which was more amusing than I expected. "Comus" was performed by Thelwall's family and his pupils. The idea of causing Milton's divine verse to be theatrically recited by a troop of stutterers is comic enough, but Thelwall has so far succeeded in his exertions, that he can enable persons who originally had strong impediments in their speech to recite verse very agreeably. Thelwall inserted some appropriate short verses, to be delivered by the younger children as Bacchanals in an interlude, which had a pleasing effect. He teaches his boys to read with a cantilena; and the accent at the close of their lines is very agreeable. It is only when such words as dĕcīsĭŏn are pronounced as four syllables, that we are reminded of the master uncomfortably.

Thelwall.

Close of the year.

December 31st.—I spent this morning at my chambers, but Thomas breakfasted with me, and Habakkuk came afterwards.

At half-past five I went with the Amyots to Mr. Hallet's, and dined there. It was a family party, and the evening passed away comfortably. I was in good spirits, and the rest of the party agreeable. The year was dismissed not festively but cheerfully.

Survey of the year.

It has been, like most of the years of my life, a year of uninterrupted health and prosperity. Besides, it is a year in which I have been so successful in my profession, that I have a prospect of affluence if the success continues, which I dare not expect, and about which I am far less anxious than I used to be. I do not now fear poverty. I am not, nor ever was, desirous of riches, but my wants do not, perhaps, increase in proportion to my means. My brother Thomas makes it a reproach to me that I do not indulge myself more. This I do not think a duty, and shall probably not make a practice. I hope I shall not contract habits of parsimony.*

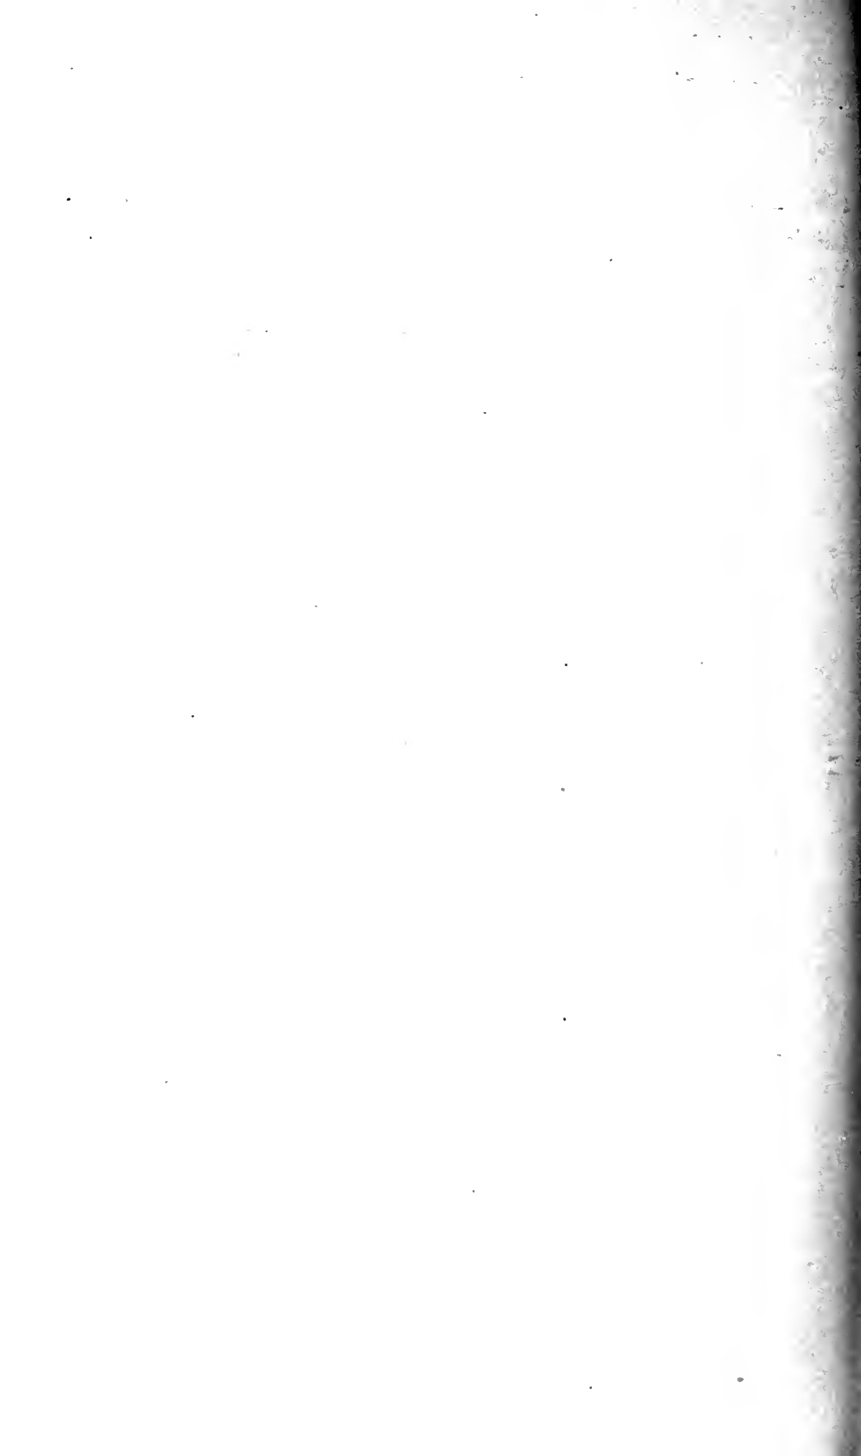
* These remarks were occasioned by the rise in H. C. R's. fees from £219 in 1814 to £321 15*s*. in the present year!

END OF VOL. I.

Woodfall and Kinder, Printers, Milford Lane, Strand, W.C.



3 vols. 8vo. with Portrait, 42*s.*

THE

LIFE AND ADMINISTRATION

OF THE

SECOND EARL OF LIVERPOOL.

COMPILED FROM ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

BY PROFESSOR YONGE.

---

2 vols. 8vo. with Portrait, 32*s.*

THE LIFE OF

SIR WALTER RALEGH.

Together with his Letters, now first Collected. Based on Contemporary Documents.

BY EDWARD EDWARDS.

Sixth year of Publication. Crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.*

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK FOR 1869.

BY FREDERICK MARTIN.

A Statistical, Mercantile, and Historical Account of the Civilized World for the Year 1869. Forming a Manual for Politicians and Merchants.

New and Revised Edition. Crown 8vo. 7*s.* 6*d.*

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF ST. BERNARD,

ABBOT OF CLAIRVAUX, A.D. 1091—1153.

BY JAMES COTTER MORISON, M.A.

Crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.*

RECOLLECTIONS OF OXFORD.

BY G. V. COX, M.A.,

Late Esquire Bedel and Coroner in the University of Oxford.

Second Edition. 18mo. 4*s.* 6*d.*

A BRIEF BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

Compiled and Arranged by CHARLES HOLE, M.A.
Trinity College, Cambridge.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LONDON.

2 vols. 8vo. with Maps and numerous Illustrations, 28*s.*

GREATER BRITAIN:

A Record of Travel in English-speaking Countries (America, Australia, India), during 1866-7.

BY CHARLES WENTWORTH DILKE, M.P.

Third Edition. Maps and numerous Illustrations, 8vo. cloth, extra gilt, 21*s.*

SIR SAMUEL W. BAKER'S

NILE TRIBUTARIES OF ABYSSINIA,

AND THE

SWORD-HUNTERS OF THE HAMRAN ARABS,

With Portraits of Sir Samuel and Lady Baker.

New and Cheaper Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Maps, Portraits, and Illustrations, cloth, extra gilt, 16*s.*

SIR SAMUEL W. BAKER'S

ALBERT N'YANZA, GREAT BASIN OF THE NILE,

AND

EXPLORATIONS OF THE NILE SOURCES.

Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7*s.* 6*d.*

A NARRATIVE OF A YEAR'S JOURNEY

THROUGH CENTRAL AND EASTERN ARABIA, 1862-3.

BY WILLIAM GIFFORD PALGRAVE.

With Map, Plans, and Portrait of the Author, engraved on Steel by JEENS.

Royal 8vo. half morocco, 31*s.* 6*d.*

ETCHING AND ETCHERS:

A TREATISE, CRITICAL AND PRACTICAL.

BY P. G. HAMERTON.

With Original Plates by REMBRANDT, CALLOT, DUJARDIN, PAUL POTTER, &c.

---

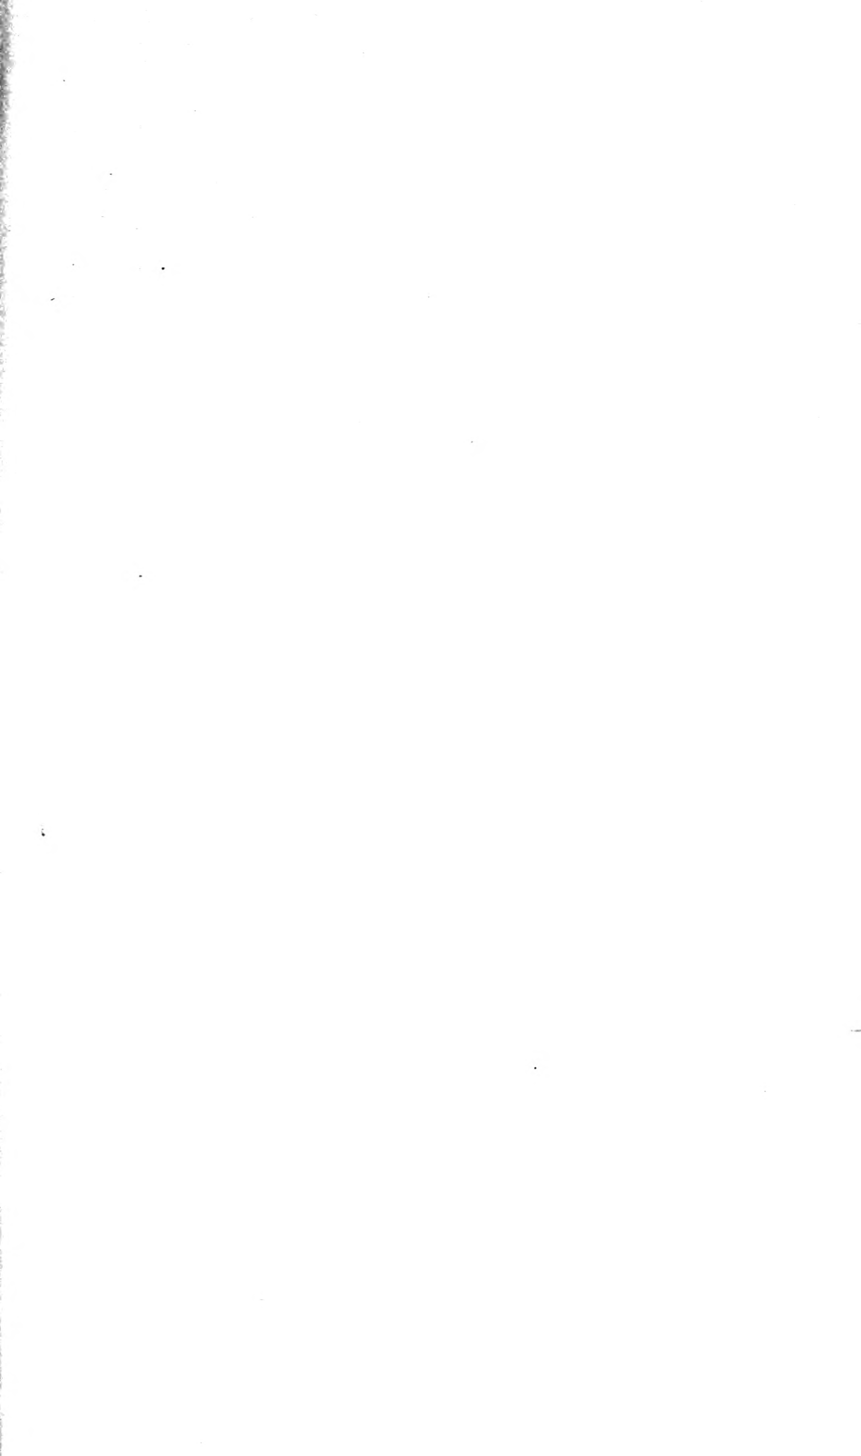
2 vols. medium 8vo. 32*s.*

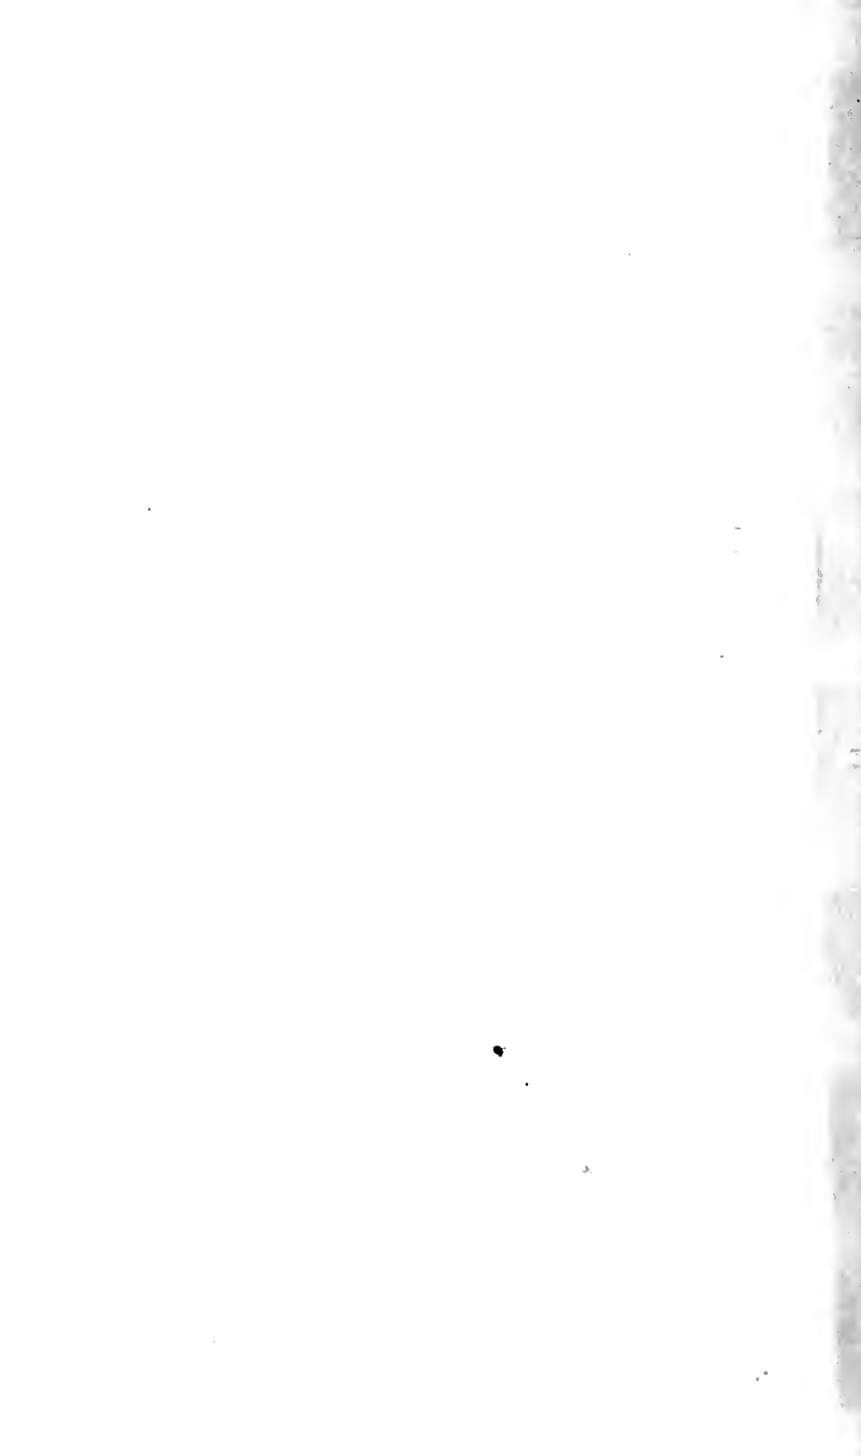
THE LIFE OF WILLIAM BLAKE, THE ARTIST.

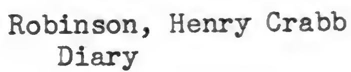
BY ALEXANDER GILCHRIST.

With numerous Illustrations from Blake's Designs and Fac-similes of his Studies of the "Book of Job."

MACMILLAN AND CO., LONDON.







Robinson, Henry Crabb
Diary

PR 5233
R2A8
v.1

Robinson, Henry Crabb
Diary